QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Mrs. Sara P., Sandusky, O. Will you please tell me, through MAIL-BAG, the origin of St. Nicholas, as applied to Christmas or in connection with the giving of Christmas gifts?

St. Nicholas was an early bishop in Lysia, Asia Minor. He is a popular saint in the Roman and Greek Churches. His feast day fell on December 6th, and in early days was especially observed, as the saint was supposed to have a loving care over children. The saint was supposed also to give marriage portions to penniless maidens, by placing them miraculously in their shoes. The custom of filling children's stockings with gifts was derived from this source, and St. Nicholas has become known as the "Children's Saint," and the day of celebration has been transferred to Christmas Eve. Santa Claus came from the Dutch Sant Nicolaus.

B. S. M., Cornell, Ill. How can there be any God except Jesus, when it is distinctly affirmed all through the Bible that there is but one God? Jesus came to earth and took on human form, but at his ascension he resumed the divinity he had laid aside for a time, and is as he always has been, the one and only God.

We know many people have advocated the view you take, but the fact that Jesus prayed to the Father, appears to us conclusive against it. We conceive of God as a spirit, and when Jesus appeared, that spirit assumed human form. He was the expression or manifestation of God, the Word, as John phrases it. In olden times, God was in the prophets, manifesting himself in their writings, but when, as the Author of Hebrews says, the latter days came, He spoke to us by his Son. That was the full and perfect manifestation of himself, the full revelation of God. Christ himself said: "My Father is greater than I" (John 14: 28). We cannot conceive of Christ speaking thus of himself as being greater than himself. Difficult as it is for the human understanding to grasp the doctrine, we are forced to believe that there is a sense, in which while Christ and the Father are one, yet that they were distinct in personality.

Miss Ellen A. C., Camden, N. J. Can you tell me who is the author of the poem beginning

I have so loved thee, but cannot, cannot hold thee;
Dying like a dream, the shadows fold thee;
Slowly thy perfect beauty fades away.
Good-by, sweet day! Good-by, sweet day?

The author was Mrs. Celia Leighton Thaxter, an American poet. She was born in Portsmouth, N. H., June 20, 1836. She spent her childhood and most of her later life at the Isles of Shoals. She died at her home, on the Island of Appledore, Isles of Shoals, in 1894.

M. E. McD., Sherwood, Ore. Why did the government establish an Electoral College? Why could not the people vote direct for President?

The Electoral College is an outgrowth of our political system and is a political necessity. The Crown Encyclopedia explains its duties very clearly in these words:

The Electoral College is the body of men elected in each State to cast the vote of the people of the State for presidential candidates. The State conventions of the various parties nominate the electors, one for each Representative, and one for each Senator in Congress. These persons are voted for on the general election day. The Twelfth amendment to the Federal Constitution orders the electors to meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President separately. They are to make distinct lists of all persons voted for by themselves for the two offices, and send those lists, sealed, to the president of the Senate at Washington. Sections 131 to 151 of the Federal Revised Statutes prescribe generally the proceedings of the electors. They are to meet on the first Wednesday in December in the year in which they are elected, in such place as the Legislature of each State may direct. The Governor is to give them three certified lists of those chosen to be electors; the electors are to make three lists of the persons balloted for by them for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency, and to the certified lists annex the certificates furnished by the Governor. They are to appoint one of their number to carry one of the certificates to the President of the Senate before the first Wednesday in January, and to send to the President of the Senate, by mail, another copy of the certificates; and the third they are to give to the judge of the district wherein they assemble.

The College is thus a general canvassing board for the votes of the States, which are dealt with in a uniform manner and under a well-regulated system, that avoids all irregularities or the possibility of disputes.

Constant Reader. 1. Please tell me if we have Scriptural foundation for believing in God for healing, and if we have Scriptural foundation for taking medicine and applying for medical aid? 2. Mark 16: 17, 18. Does this apply to followers with full belief now?

1. There is Scriptural warrant for both. God not only forgives, but heals. See Psa. 103: 3; 107: 20; Luke 5: 17; Acts 14: 9; Jas. 5: 16; I. Cor. 12: 9, 28, etc. Divine blessing is to be implored to render efficacious any remedies applied. Even Christ himself did not disdain in his miracles to employ material aids (see John 9: 6). The Divine method does not exclude the use of means (see II. Kings 20: 7). 2. These signs belonged more distinctively to apostolic times.

Mrs. J. F. S., Chicago. Is Syria called the new Land of Promise, and why is it so-called?

It is not so called. Palestine, the original "Promised Land," is now in Syria. The term, "New Land of Promise" has been applied to other countries where the Hebrews have found asylum, and more recently to the United States.

Reader. What is meant in John 5: 4, where it says: "An angel came down and troubled the water"?

It simply means that he moved or agitated the water.

Jack, W., W. Va. Do Japanese surgeons dress the wounds of soldiers with charcoal, and if so, how is it applied?

It is said that a Japanese surgeon can dress the wounds of 500 men at the cost of twenty-five cents. They use finely powdered charcoal, obtained by the slow combustion of straw in closed furnaces. Sachets filled with it are applied to the wounds, and its antiseptic and absorbent qualities, generally effect a rapid cure.

Reader, New Rochelle, N. Y. Please tell me something about Ralph Trine, the author of "In Tune with the Infinite."

Ralph Waldo Trine was born in Mt. Morris, Ill., in 1866. He graduated at Knox College, Galesburg, Ill. At Johns Hopkins University he pursued various studies, and became deeply interested in social problems. He was made director of the American Humane Society, and of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. His publications include The Life Books, Character Building, Thought, Power, etc.

John P., Elmira, N. Y. Can you give me some statistics as to the number of postal employees in different countries, and which has the greatest number?

Germany heads the list with 242,000; United States next, with 239,000; Great Britain third, with 184,000; France, 81,000; Austria, 59,000; Russia, 57,962; and Japan, 57,965. Every other country falls below 50,000.

C. E. R., Norwalk, Conn. One of those for whom I subscribed wishes to know something definite about President Diaz. She says she happened to see my letter in the newspapers and magazines that have come in her way.

General Diaz has lately been elected and inaugurated President for the seventh time. Ramon Corral, a distinguished civilian, is Vice-President, and is generally regarded as Diaz's chosen successor. Meanwhile Diaz is in good health, and more popular and widely beloved than ever.

Ch. H., Paradise, Pa. Will you inform me where I can get some training on the Bible, and be fitted for preaching, and, at the same time, have an opportunity to do some speaking, while I am being trained and given lessons?

Write to Moody Training Institute, Chicago, or to the Moody Training School, at East Northfield, Mass.

Mrs. A. Pew, 1917 Third Street, N. W., Washington, D. C., asks some reader to send her a copy of the hymn which contains the verse:

Faith now beholds the shining river,
Flowing from underneath the throne.

MISCELLANEOUS

W. S., Romulus, N. Y. Yes.

Y. A. M. Address her at New York City.

A. J. P., Grand Forks, N. D. There is no politics in THE MAIL-BAG.

A. L. M., Toccoa, Ga. Send to the Assay Office, Philadelphia, for all information.

Subscriber, Harlan, Ia. Write to Fleming H. Revell Co., publishers, New York.

J. R., Hillsdale, Pa. The ages for compulsory education in most States are from six to fourteen.

Joseph K., Westchester, Pa. Toasts are as old as history. We have never seen their origin stated anywhere.

Reader, Clarksburg, Ind. Write to Armour Institute, Chicago, for all information regarding civil engineering course.

W. B., Albany, N. Y. No; the news of Gen. Kuroki's death seems to have been unfounded. Tokio dispatches deny the rumor absolutely.

H. F., Franktown, Va., and V. L. C., Beverly, W. Va. On the electoral vote: Roosevelt had 343 votes, Parker, 133; official figures on total vote not yet to hand.

W. R., Fullerton, Neb. We consider that the prevailing prices of religious literature are very low indeed. But there are some people who seem to think that any price is too much.

D. H. M., Cookesville, N. Y. There are two kinds of stock dealings. One is the purchase of stocks outright at market prices; the other is dealing in "margins," which is simply gambling.

N. S. B., Brooklyn, N. Y. 1. S. H. Hadley and H. H. Hadley were brothers. The former is the present head of the Water Street Mission, and an active evangelist. The latter died nearly a year ago. 2. Miss Reed contracted leprosy through coming in contact with the lepers. Most missionaries are careful to avoid such personal contact. 3. You will find the poem "Beautiful Snow" in many of the popular collections of verse.

A Great National Symposium

IN NEXT WEEK'S ISSUE OF THIS PAPER

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has secured from the leading men and women of the Nation expressions of their individual views on the following important question:

"What, in your opinion, is the most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people, during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration?"

These contributions form one of the most remarkable presentations of brilliant, original, helpful views, by prominent people, on a topic of absorbing interest, that has ever been placed before the reading public.

Among the Contributors are:

HON. J. G. CANNON, Speaker of the House.
HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN.
HON. W. P. HEPBURN, Interstate Commerce Commissioner.

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

THE CITY'S POOR GUESTS AT TABLE

SUPERINTENDENT YORKE

THE MUNICIPAL LODGING-HOUSE BAKERY

The Problem of the Unemployed

CORPORATIONS may be without souls, but city governments certainly are not, if New York may be taken as an example of how the poor and unemployed—not the criminal or the professional beggar class—are cared for at the city's expense. On the east side of First Avenue, at the corner of Twenty-third Street, stands a plain, box-like structure, painted white. It looks like a manufactory or warehouse, which, indeed it was before the city authorities took it in hand, about eight years ago, and installed therein all the appurtenances necessary for the running of a clean and comfortable lodging-house.

There are beds in the Municipal Lodging-House for 299 wayfarers. The dormitory for women contains forty of this number. A ring at the entrance brings a kindly-faced, elderly man to the door, who welcomes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S representative most cordially.

Up one flight of the cleanest of stairs, there is a large room with a long table, at which the women eat their suppers and breakfasts, for the municipality does not send its weary guests supperless to bed, nor dismiss them breakfastless the next morning, when they once more have to face a day in the streets, hunting for the work which so often eludes them. Supper consists of a pint of hot coffee, and all the bread one can eat. Breakfast the same, with the addition of a dish of oatmeal. There are several little compartments, called state-rooms, on this floor, where women with babies are lodged. Here, in addition to the comfortable bed, with its clean linen and warm blankets, are all the toilet requisites in enameled ware—wash-stand, pitcher, etc.—and clean towels. The larger room is fitted up with "double-decker" woven-wire cots, all neatly and warmly covered. Each woman on coming in is required, after getting her supper, to go into the bath-room, and stand under a gentle shower of warm water, until, with soap and scrubbing, she is perfectly clean; then a clean white night-dress is given her, and she is ready for a good night's sleep.

APPLICANTS FOR WORK AT THE BOWERY MISSION FREE LABOR BUREAU

All applicants, both men and women, are subjected to the scrutiny of a physician, before being allowed to go upstairs or bathe. If any are sick enough to be in the hospital, they are immediately sent there; but if there is only some slight ailment, it is treated by the doctor who makes the examination.

Quarters for the men are similar to those for the women, with the exception that there are no "state-rooms," and that the dormitories are much larger, this being necessary to accommodate the greater number who apply for lodging. In the basement are the fires, and the machinery which runs the steam-heating plant, the kitchen, and the laundry, with drying rooms, mangles, etc. Here, also, is a big, ovenlike room, where all clothing is subject to intense cleansing heat and fumigation. Every man is given a brass tag to hang about his neck, while a duplicate tag, with a corresponding number, is attached to his clothing. After hot-air treatment the clothing is put in a separate compartment, ready for the morning.

While the Municipal Lodging-House will shelter any poor, idle, or unfortunate man or woman who applies there (discriminating against tramps, loafers, and chronic idlers), this hospitality is only for three nights in a month, except in special cases, when the time may be extended at the option of the Superintendent, whose long experience with the classes of people who drift there enables him to sort out the "grafter" from the deserving poor who are honestly trying to help themselves, and who would not lodge nor feed at the city's expense if they had any other place to go. Name, nationality, age, and sex, of each applicant is entered on the records; also where he lived last, by whom employed, and at what kind of work. Those who try to deceive are investigated, and if they are found to be making a business of "working" the Institution, they are promptly arrested as vagrants and sent to the "Island."

"Do not think," said Superintendent Yorke, "that the people who come here are all tramps, and ne'er-do-wells. Many are men who would be glad to work if they could get it to do; men who, before coming to New York, were living in country towns or smaller cities, and having read of the thousands of workmen employed upon the Subway, the Pennsylvania terminal, or some other big undertaking, say to themselves, 'New York's the place for me,' and gathering up a few dollars, they start for the place where they think a man has only to ask for work to get it. It does not take long for them to join the great army of the unemployed; their little hoard of coin dwindles until there is nothing left—not even enough to pay for a lodging on the Bowery. Many a poor fellow is found in this strait. His watch and what clothing he can spare have been exchanged for a few dollars and pawn-tickets, the former soon spent, and the latter carefully put away until he can redeem his property. His clothing gets seedy and thin, and thinner still, as the weather grows colder; his once white shirt is gray with dirt, and his collar and tie are companions in distress. Stockings are no longer considered a necessity; his poor, broken shoes hardly keep his half-frozen feet from the pavement. At last the day comes when he has not one cent in his pocket, nor a morsel of food in his stomach. No one would employ him now; he has become a 'suspicious-looking character;' so, footsore, hungry, and discouraged, he comes to the Municipal Lodging-House, and asks for food and shelter. Perhaps he has tramped the streets for nights before coming here, which he feels to be his last resort."

"What brings able-bodied men to such extremity?" was asked Mr. Yorke. He gave as one of the reasons that misery loves company, and finds plenty of it in the city streets, and in parts of the town where the great congregation of the "down and out" meets. Then there is always that will-o'-the-wisp of a job, that men who are not tramps see daily glimmerings of. They cannot seem to comprehend that, no matter how numerous may be the places

NEW YEAR TIMIDITIES

A NEW SERMON BY REV. FRANK DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.*

WHAT a change there is in our way of keeping the holidays from that of olden times! The old-fashioned New Year's and the old-fashioned Christmas, the old-fashioned Thanksgiving Day, were as different from their successors, as the poke bonnets and hoop skirts and powdered curls of Colonial days were different from the masterpieces of the milliners and dressmakers and hair dressers of modern times. We talk of the triumph of the locomotive and the telegraph in annihilating distance, but I am not sure that they have not done more to separate the members of families. The greeting that now comes by wire from a son on the other side of the world, in former times was brought by the son himself, who seldom went more than a day's coach ride from the old homestead. Then fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, cousins and grandchildren, could all gather under the same roof. Then presents did not have to be done up in packages aud sent days ahead across the continents or seas, in order to arrive at their destination in time for the annual holidays. But each brother and sister, each child and parent, could deliver their Christmas gifts with a smile, and seal their holiday good wishes with a loving kiss.

Gloomy Forebodings

A New Year's greeting is the sermon of this morning. With the same kindly spirit in which friends used to come to my mother's home and wish her a "Happy New Year," and with tender reminiscences of the past and cheerful wishes for the future, make the day a joyous and hopeful one, I come to you this New Year Sabbath day. But instead of wishing you a "Happy New Year" in the brusque, happy-go-lucky way in which friend used to salute friend upon the street, I am going, as your pastor, to have a heart-to-heart talk with you. I am going to have you first tell all your troubles and fears, and then I shall say, "Friend, for the past twelve months you have been looking on the dark side of life. You have been indulging too much in gloomy anticipations and anxieties. What is the matter?" Then you will point out to me all the dark clouds that are hanging upon the edge of your horizon, and you will tell me why this New Year's Day is to you a "Blue Sunday." Then I shall try, by the help of God, to scatter those dark clouds and change your New Year timidities of Doubt into New Year certainties of Gospel Hope.

"Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me?" "First," you answer, "because I have been defeated so often in the struggle of life that my backbone is gone. I have been like a sea captain who has been wrecked again and again, until at last, he feels that every threatening storm means a foundered ship. I am like a merchant who has been caught in three or four great panics, and again and again, through no fault of his own, has had his fortune swept away. He is timid about making a new venture. I am like a mother who has buried four or five of her babies, and has only one left. Each time the baby coughs or catches cold, or has a fever, the mother is almost beside herself with fear lest she might lose her only remaining child. It is well enough for some people with bright eyes, to anticipate

The Joys of a Coming Year

But as for me, I have had so many misfortunes that I have only half a heart for my struggle which is ahead during the next twelve months."

My brother, I am not surprised at your timidity. It makes a great deal of difference how a man fools around machinery, if he has lost an arm, or a leg, or a finger, as some have done by being reckless. It makes a great deal of difference how one reads the "Signs of the Times," after he has had his fortune swept away by a destroying wind. Some weeks ago, in one of my pastoral calls, I saw a beautifully pathetic picture, entitled "After the Tornado." The scene was evidently placed in one of the wildernesses of the West. A young man in the overalls and the wooden shoes of a poor farmer, stood upon the edge of a field, with his poor young wife and a couple of children clinging to her poor dress. They were looking, yes, out of the saddest of eyes. Why? They were looking at a magnificent field of wheat that a few days ago was almost ready to be harvested. But that wheat by the storm was battered down and crushed into all sorts of shapes, like the waves of the sea tumbling upon the beach. They were looking at the wreck of a whole year of work. They were looking into the bloodshot eyes and the red tongues of a hungry pack of wolves about to be unleashed by starvation, which soon would be growling and snarling about their doors during the coming winter. Ah, yes, it makes a great deal of difference how one looks at a coming year's labor before and after a destroying tempest. Most of you, like Job, have had your which have wrecked the home and destroyed your business, and killed your cattle and sheep, and left you stripped and forlorn.

But, though bitter trouble may have assailed you in the past, that is no reason why you should think every dark cloud presages for you a destroying tempest. Indeed, I go further than that: I do not believe your past storms of troubles have all been destroying tempests. You are still living, you have survived your worst troubles, and now, chastened and strengthened, you are going forward armed by past experience, and wiser by your trials, strong in faith, to meet what the new year may bring.

> It can bring with it nothing,
> But He will bear us through;
> Who gives the lilies clothing,
> Will clothe his people too.

When the great philosopher wrote the words of my text, he was expressing a negative truth. "He that observeth the wind shall not sow," and the converse of that fact is, that if a man will only go forth with a brave heart, if he will only plant and sow his seed faithfully and conscientiously, God will give him a large harvest. "To him that soweth righteousness shall be a sure reward." Will you not believe this? Oh, man, will you not go forth to your coming year's work with a brave and a hopeful spirit for a coming conquest.

Business Trials

But there are some whose apprehensions of coming trial are based on facts of a different kind. "My trouble," says one, "is not due to a lack of faith in God, or in my own ability, but in the loyalty of others. The apostolic advice, not to be unequally yoked with unbelievers extends further than the marriage relation. I am finding that out in the broader sense of business. It also means that those who are unequally yoked together can never pull well as a team. My business associates and I are fretting and worrying and irritating and retarding one another's labors."

Yes, brother, I at once catch the meaning of your Bible simile. Although born in the city, I have spent a great deal of my spare time in the country, and I have witnessed again and again feats of horse-team pulling. The farmers have a great deal of pride in their horses. If one farmer can have a perfectly matched team of heavy farm horses, he always thinks they can outdraw and outpull all other teams in the country. It is not uncommon at the county fairs to have these trials of strength tested. A great load will be piled upon a sledge at the bottom of a hill. Then the team will be hitched up. The farmer will take the reins firmly in his hands and cry "Get up!" If the horses pull together evenly and steadily, in all probability the sledge will move over the hard, bare ground as if the runners were slipping over the winter's snow. But if one horse jerks at his traces one moment, and then balks when his mate is pulling, it is impossible to move the heavy load. The great difficulty with your business and professional life may be that you are not "equally yoked" with your associates. You may have pulled while they are balking, and they may be pulling while you are balking. But did you ever stop to think that perhaps your lack of faith in yourself may be the chief reason why they have no faith in you, and why they do not work in harmony with you?

Beware of Pessimism

Lack of faith in our own work will kill absolutely any faith others may have in our ultimate success. The old proverb says, "Rats will leave a sinking ship." All our friends and associates will leave us as quickly as they can if they once get into their minds the thought that we ourselves feel that we are certainly doomed to failure. A man who is always anticipating failure and taking a gloomy view of the future, not only works half-heartedly himself, but depresses his asssociates. What Church would wish to listen to a minister who had no hope of the ultimate triumph of the Gospel? If he were to preach, week after week, sermons the key-note of which was that man is a failure, the Church a failure, Christ, for the most of us, a failure, and the world is going to the dogs, would anyone want to listen to such sermons? Would anyone continue to work for the upbuilding of the grand old Church of Christ, which has had such a mighty influence for good in the past, and is having such a mighty influence for good in the present, and will have such a mighty influence for good in the future? No, of course you would not. You would say to yourself: "Well, the Church is going to smash, and the people are going to smash. I guesss I will get off the train and let the 'Limited Express of Destruction' go over the open drawbridge as it may."

Supposing your daughter is sick, and you call in a physician and beg him to cure her. That physician, having examined her, declares there is no hope. He leaves some medicine for her, but doubts if it can do her any good; he advises this course and that, but says there is really no hope of saving her. What would you do with such a doctor? You would turn him out of doors in the twinkling of an eye! You would say, "If a physician has no faith in his own medicine, I will have no faith in him." And yet, the strange fact of life is this: there are scores and hundreds of men who always keep talking about their misfortunes. They keep on telling their employees only the dark side of their business. After awhile their employees and business associates lose faith in their business prospects, and they do not work as they ought.

What you need, Oh man, at the beginning of this New Year, is to take a big inventory, not of your misfortunes but of your blessings. Find out all the bright things you know about your life. Repeat them over and over and over to yourself.

Get Faith in God

and in yourself. Then your associates will get faith in you. By their increased labor you will get faith in them. Then, together with faith in each other, and faith in God, you will go forth with renewed zeal for the seedplanting and the multitudinous harvest will surely come. Never let your associates know that you have lost faith in yourself. The poorest song a farmer ever sung in the time of sowing and seed-planting is the pessimistic song of old, which will destroy the enthusiasm of every farm hand:

> Thirty days hath September, April, June, and November,
> From January up to May it raineth every day,
> All the rest have thirty-one, without a blessed ray of sun.
> And if any of them had two-and-thirty,
> They's be just as wet and twice as dirty.

"Well," says some one else afflicted with New Year's Timidities, "I not only have lost faith in myself and in my associates, but I have also lost faith in the good deeds which I try to do for the lost and the needy. I am not an angel. I make no pretense of being a perfect man, but I do try to do some good in the world. Almost all my good intentions have gone for naught. I can understand the disappointment of men who have made honest but futile attempts to help people. For the more you do for some people, the less those people seem to be willing to do for themselves. I do not want to lead a selfish life, but I do not intend to be bled for nothing."

What would you think of a farmer who should say to you, "I will not plant a kernel of corn, unless I am positively sure that from this kernel will grow a stubble of corn; or a grain of wheat, barley or buckwheat, unless from this very seed I shall get my thirty, or sixty, or a hundred-fold return." Why, you would laugh such a farmer to scorn. You would say to him, "You do not know the first A B C of agriculture. A planter can afford to lose a thousand seeds if he can get a harvest from the remaining seeds he plants." Yet, all through life, you can find men who estimate their successes and failures, not by the glorious returns they receive from a few good seeds well planted in good ground, but by the failure of the good seed which has inadvertently fallen in bad soil.

Help the Needy

Why don't you help that young man who has just landed in town and is stranded? I grant that he has been a wayward boy; that his life is not what it ought to be; but in spite of that, why don't you help him? You know you can give him a position if you will. "Oh," you answer, "what is the use? I have tried to be a friend to young men in the past, but I am done now with turning my business house into a Christian mission. I draw the line sharply between business and philanthropy. I do my Christian work in church, but not in my store; I run the latter on business principles. Why, sir, I have befriended four young men in the past! I even went so far as to try to send one of those young men through college, because he was the son of an old chum of mine, who is now dead. All four turned out badly. They were ungrateful dogs at that! You cannot make something out of nothing."

> A life of nothings, nothing worth
> From that first nothing ere its birth
> To that last nothing under earth.

Yes, I grant that your good seed in the case of these four young men may have been thrown away. But would it not be worth while to have four, five, or even ten such good seed-plantings amount to naught, if only the eleventh "seed" took root in some young man's heart and saved just one young man? Would not the satisfaction you get from having led one young man to be saved for Christ, compensate you for all your wasted labor upon nineteen young men who were not saved? God will not reward you according to the success of your labors, but according to the efforts you have honestly made, whether they have succeeded or failed. Do your duty and leave the result to God.

Patient with the Erring

Oh, missionary worker in the New York slums, what is the good of your Rescue Missions and your testimony meetings, night after night? You know just as well as I know, that nine-tenths of all your professed converts will become backsliders. That young woman, who now arises with tears in her eyes and says: "Thank God, I have been saved from sin," may to-morrow be treading again the old path of wickedness. That man who signs the pledge to-night, may be drunk again next week.

"All that you state is true," answers the missionary of the New York slums. "One-third, one-half, aye, perhaps three-fourths of all our reformed cases may become backsliders. But if one out of every four, aye, if one out of every ten be saved, is not the tenth man worth all the effort we have bestowed on the other nine? All the seed the farmer plants does not fall on good soil. Shall the farmer cease to plant? All our labors for Christ may not bring in a Gospel harvest, but are not the rewards we receive a multipotent blessing for our labors, no matter how great they may be?"

"Yes," some one says, "that is very pretty talk, but it does not bear well the test of logic. If while I sow one good seed, nine other men are sowing tares, will not the nine tares increase just as rapidly as the one good seed? In time, will not the earth, instead of being covered with the glory of God 'as the waters cover the sea,' be covered with the blood of a destroyed world? Instead of the world being better, as we would wish, is it not morally and spiritually becoming more and more depraved? Have I not a right, then, to my New Year Timidities?" No, my brother! No, no! A thousand times no! The reports of the Gospel meteorologists do not bear out your theories.

What the Superintendent of the Weather Bureau can do, in reading the positions of the atmospheric storm-clouds, the Gospel meteorlogist can do in telling us about the storm-clouds of sin. What is it we learn from these Christian meteorological reports? From one and another heathen land comes the story of people turning from idols to serve the living God. Everywhere, slavery and cruelty and inhumanity, are being gradually suppressed. The world is coming more and more under the influence of the principles of Christ. It is a slow process, but the general trend is in the right direction. Evil for thousands of years has had its sway, we must not expect it to be easily or quickly dislodged. But the good time is coming. Only do not let us who live in Christian lands, lose heart or hope. We have the promise of victory, we see the sky growing rosy with the coming dawn. Let us work on in

Faith and Patience

Oh, my brother, think not this New Year's Day opens a "Dark Day" for Christ. Think not that your labors for the coming year will be thrown away. Push on in faith and hope. Drive up. Look up, in the name of Jesus. Plant in God's name, plant for Jesus Christ.

No New Year's greeting from me could be voiced in more inspiring language than in that of my text. These eight words have for me a loving remembrance. If any one should ask me what was my father's favorite passage of Scripture, without a moment's hesitation I would answer: Ecclesiastes 11: 4, "He that observeth the wind shall not sow." They were to him his meat and strength for every-day work. He quoted them to himself almost every day of his life. He quoted them to his wife and children, hundreds, aye, thousands of times. If any of us were discouraged, or blue, or cast down, his advice always was the same. Take courage. All will yet come out right. "He that observeth the wind shall not sow." Shall not we on this New Year's Sabbath press on with glorious anticipation for the Gospel seed-planting at hand, which will ultimately mean our harvest ahead? I pray God that this coming year may be the best of years to all of us, as it will surely be the last of earthly years to some of us. A Happy, Happy New Year!

where labor is required, there are at all times more men in the city than can be employed, and that the stranger stands but a poor show in competition with men who belong here, who know all the ropes, and in the case of mechanics, belong to the Unions. Then the ranks of the unemployed are swollen by men who have been thrown out of work through sickness or accident, or through dulness in trade, and men who lose their places through incompetence; but these last are not in large proportion. The census at the Municipal Lodgings is curtailed in a marked manner after a heavy fall of snow. Hundreds of men are temporarily employed by the Street Cleaning Department, and the free lodging places see no more of them while the snow lasts.

While the writer sat in the office of the Municipal Lodging-House, there came a ring at the door. It was nearing 6 P. M. —the hour when the doors are opened to admit the hungry and weary—and two young women walked in, each with a baby in her arms. One of these women was small, dark, and very pretty, and with her great innocent eyes and oval face she might have sat as model for a Madonna, with her baby clasped in her arms. In broken sentences, she answered the questions put to her: Name, Anna——, age twenty-two, born in Hungary. Husband in hospital. She had been turned out of her little home for non-payment of rent. The simple record was made in the big book, and Anna and child were sure of a good bed for the night, indeed for several nights, when, if she has no friends, and cannot find work, the city will find room for her in some other of its institutions.

This winter promises to be a harder one among the working classes than the last, which was one of great suffering among New York's poor. All the city's charities will necessarily be largely extended. The days are no more when a man can sit on a park bench the whole night through. It may not seem very cold to us; winter weather appears quite mild when one is dressed in warm clothing, when the fires of a well-nourished physique are replenished three times a day with good, nourishing food. But winter weather, when the sun has gone down on a day of futile wandering, and a man has no place to go, is quite another matter. A penny roll cannot stop the pangs of long-continued hunger. Many people do not know where to go for help, and brains as well as bodies grow numb from cold. As the night draws on, the crowd begins to assemble at the entrance to the Municipal Lodging-House. On very cold nights it is so large that the surplus is sent down to a sort of "Annex" at the foot of Twenty-sixth Street, where there are no beds, but the rooms are warm, and hundreds are glad of a resting-place, even on a plank floor, where they are sheltered from the biting winter wind.

The Municipal Lodging-House is but one of many places where homeless and workless men and women can find shelter. There are station-houses and numbers of missions which are overwhelmed, and when the short, sharp winter day is done, and the long cold night comes on, all these shelters are taxed to their utmost; not always by the tramp and "bum," for these individuals have ways of providing for themselves which would not occur to people who are only unfortunate. It is not the criminal class, either, which come to the doors of these shelters; they also have other resources; but the twenty to thirty thousand unemployed—many of whom would never ask for help if they could get work—compose the throng from which this pitiful, ragged, hungry army is recruited.

WOMEN'S QUARTERS AT THE MUNICIPAL LODGINGS

The Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau

The work of the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau is now thoroughly under way. Many of the men, who otherwise would have lost no time in availing themselves of its help—men who are earnestly anxious to secure employment—have been at work this last week in the great snow shoveling army under Commissioner Woodbury. But, notwithstanding this fact, many worthy fellows have registered, and are ready at a moment's notice to go into the country and undertake work on farms, in stables, and anywhere else where unskilled labor is required.

The men hailed with delight the announcement that the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau, on hearing from any employer within fifty miles of New York, would undertake to send strong, respectable and willing workingmen to such employers, free of all costs of registration and transportation; the employers, on their part, undertaking to hire the men at living wages.

There has not been time yet to hear from employers in the country in response to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S invitation, but the work of the registration of men is carried on every evening after the regular service. To furnish some idea of the kind of men who register, a list of the registrations for the last week is given below:

WALES AFLAME WITH REVIVAL

ONE of the greatest evangelistic efforts England has witnessed in recent years is now in progress in Liverpool, where Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander are conducting a three months' campaign. Tournament Hall, in which the meetings are being held, has been specially erected for the purpose, and is probably the finest building of its kind in the United Kingdom. It has seating accommodations for 12,000 and several thousands more can be admitted.

The interior presents a very attractive appearance. On the platform the choir seats rise till they almost reach the roof, and placed thus the singers send forth a mighty volume of sound. Above the platform are the words, in huge, distinct letters, "The Gift of God is Eternal Life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Other texts are displayed throughout the hall. Above the royal box is the injunction, "Get Right with God!"

For the past few weeks the religious world has been thrilled with the news of the great revival which has broken out in Wales. At one of the meetings in Liverpool, recently, the close relationship of the Torrey-Alexander Mission with the Welsh revival was fully explained by several speakers. In October last, the American evangelists conducted a four weeks' mission in Cardiff, South Wales. At first a great amount of indifference was encountered. A day of fasting and prayer was observed, and prayer was asked not only for the work in Cardiff itself, but also for a general revival throughout Wales. That day marked the turning point in the Cardiff Mission. From that time onward the blessing descended in abundance, and since then the work has been going on with increasing power.

Recently, a party of several hundred Cardiff friends of the recent mission, many of whom had been converted while it lasted, came all the way to Liverpool to attend the meetings in Tournament Hall. The testimonies they gave were remarkable. At the afternoon meeting, these testimonies flowed in one continuous stream for an hour and a-half. The Rev. Allan Spencer, a Cardiff minister, and one of the secretaries of the Cardiff Mission, said: "The Mission in Cardiff has been an immense blessing to the whole town. There have been many definite additions to the Churches, and all our Churches have been wonderfully quickened. Every Sunday there are conversions in our places of worship all over Cardiff, and the revival is now spreading through the whole of the district. To our first service there came a band of friends from a little place on the other side of Swansea, and they took back with them the spirit of the Mission. Their minister came, and when he went back to his own home he heard that there was a Welsh collier named Evan Roberts, who had received a wonderful baptism of the Holy Spirit. He sent for Mr. Roberts to come and see him, and he said: 'I want you to come and conduct a Mission in my chapel. Will you come?' Mr. Roberts, after some little hesitation, said he would come. From that day there has been spreading through the valley of Wales, through that great coal district, a mighty revival—a glorious outpouring of God's Holy Spirit. Now we have these meetings all day long, sometimes all night long. They have very little preaching; sometimes prayer, testimony, singing; all things just as the Holy Spirit guides, and in those services hundreds and hundreds every week are being brought to Jesus Christ. For several weeks past there has not been a football match on a Saturday afternoon. The public-houses are closed. The revival is spreading from valley to valley, from town to town. Two nights ago, in one of our meetings, a man said, 'Yesterday I was up among the hills, and I called on a large builder. I could never get him to listen to me when I talked about religion, but now he would not talk a single word about business; it was all religion, from beginning to end. The business places are shut up.' You cannot walk down the streets of some of those Welsh villages without two, or three, or sometimes half a dozen people stopping you in the road and speaking to you about your soul.

A GROUP OF WELSH CONVERTS, WHO GAVE TESTIMONIES AT THE GREAT LIVERPOOL REVIVAL

"One of my colleagues went to take a Mission in a little place called Blackwood, twelve miles from Cardiff—a place of 2,000 inhabitants. In ten days, 250 people came out seeking Christ—a tenth of the population. At Penarth, outside of Cardiff four miles, every morning at 7.30 for weeks they have been praying. What is the result? To-day in Penarth, in all the churches, we are having conversions. They prayed for the young men specially last week, and in one Baptist chapel in the last fortnight there have been a hundred conversions, a great number of them young men."

At Dr. Torrey's request, a well-dressed man got up on the platform. He had been known, he remarked, as "the worst man in Cardiff." One Saturday night he was drinking with his companions in a saloon, and after spending all his money, some one bet him a gallon of beer he would not attend the Torrey-Alexander Mission that night. He declared he would, and would occupy a front seat. Under the influence of drink he went to the meeting, and frequently interrupted Dr. Torrey as he preached. Dr. Torrey, however, spoke to him kindly, telling him that Jesus could save even him, no matter how bad he was. The man was converted that night, and has since given striking proof of the reality of the change in his life. This was the story he himself told.

Though the Mission in Liverpool is only half way through, it has already exerted a mighty influence all over the city. Twice a week Dr. Torrey speaks on the Corn Exchange, where he is gathering the typical business men, who listen with great eagerness.

A GIRL'S TRIP TO THE FAR CUMBERLANDS

LET me tell you about my last trip to the mountains. At Lexington, Ky., we met Rev. Mr. Paxson and wife from Texas, who were going to help in our missions at Torrent and Glencairn. Mrs. Paxson was delighted to get back to Old Kentucky, even to the mountains. At Athol we stopped to see Mr. and Mrs. Auld, who were living in the cottage and working in the mission there. They seemed to be happy, though it must have been a big change from Florida, where the land is so flat, to the Cumberlands, where it is almost perpendicular. Mr. Auld has had new shutters put on the church and glass in the windows, and preaches there every Sunday.

That night we went on to Elkatawa in an awful flood. The creeks got so high I could not go on up to Miss Withers, the missionary from Virginia, who lives half a mile from Elkatawa, so a lady let me stay with her. Papa and Mr. McBride slept on the floor of a little house down by the creek. Papa said it was a better bed than he had in the army in Virginia. Mr. McBride, our missionary here, is working on Kessler Chapel, our new church. It is in a beautiful situation overlooking the little village and valley, and surrounded by mountains. It is the first and only church here. The Mormons have been around here, and some people have joined them.

Early the next morning, we got two mountain ponies and started to Buckhorn, twenty-six miles across the mountains. Mine was the best pacer, but so lazy he wore me out. We passed Mrs. McAndrew's mission at White Pine. She and Miss Withers are certainly workers. They walk all over these mountains, visiting, teaching and singing the Gospel. Up Cane Creek we met a wagon between the steep mountains, and had to turn back because the wagon filled all the road. The sun rose at 9 o'clock, and I never saw a lovelier morning beneath the great forest trees and vines.

THE "LOG COLLEGE" IN THE MOUNTAINS

We had a long, hot ride up the river to Canoe. At Mr. Sam Callahan's we got dinner, and sent our horses back to Elkatawa. We were driven up to Crockettsville, about eight miles, along the beautiful Kentucky River. Crockettsville is only a Post-office. Here I had to stop for want of a horse, but papa went on over the mountain to Buckhorn, to preach that night. He sent for me next morning. We had to climb a mountain called Bunker Hill, and it was the worst I ever saw.

At 9 o'clock I reached the Log College, and it is beautiful. It sits on a mountain brow, opposite the church on Laurel Point, with a lovely valley between. Mr. and Mrs. Murdoch and Mrs. Gordon live nearby, and Dr. and Mrs. Saunders occupy a room in the college.

Papa preached mornings at 8 o'clock in the college chapel, and at night in the church. You never saw such a path up the mountain to the church before they made the new one! It was like climbing a tree; but they all got there and crowded the church. I never saw so many babies, and they didn't whimper at all. Many people joined the church; forty-three I believe. Mr. Murdoch baptized thirty-five at one time. After papa had preached over a week, we started home at 6 o'clock in the morning on two mules. I must have looked like a horse-fly on that big mule; but I stuck to him, and he brought me through all right. Papa stopped to see Mr. and Mrs. Cochran, our missionaries on Turner Creek, and preached in Gordon Chapel at 10 o'clock. There was a good congregation on Thursday morning. Dr. Saunders came this far with us, and remained to preach over Sunday. I don't think I ever saw such a poor country as this. It is pitiful.

SHOSHONE INDIANS NEAR THE MISSION HOUSE

CHIEF WASHAKIE

BISHOP FUNSTEN ON HIS WAY TO THE RESERVATION

Mission Work Among the Shoshones

By RT. REV. J. B. FUNSTEN, BISHOP OF BOISE

FAR away in Western Wyoming, one hundred and fifty miles from the railroad, at the base of the snow-crowned Wind River range of the Rockies, is a large and important reservation for the Shoshone Indians.

"How long have you been living and working among these Indians?" I asked of the Rev. John Roberts.

"Twenty-three years," was his reply.

This simple statement means far more of devotion and self-sacrifice than one might think. It indicates a life dedicated to the cause of ignorant and suffering humanity. The Shoshones are, perhaps, the most backward of all the western Indians. They and their kindred tribes occupy those reservations, set apart in what is known as the semi-arid region extending over the whole plateau country. They form one of the three great divisions of the Indian family. They appear to have been traditional enemies of the Sioux and other strong tribes. Being unable to cope with them, they were forced to occupy the less desirable and mountainous places.

The dawn of American history finds them living in the fastnesses of the Rockies. They became the guides of the Lewis and Clark Expedition. The Hunt Expedition, described in Irving's Astoria, locates them in the mountains, and also discovered members of the tribe, scattered and poor, in the valley of the great Snake River, a country at that time so desert and lava-scarred, that it seemed to those weary men to be accursed. How little could those men foresee that this dismal land of the Shoshones, would, some day, through irrigation, be turned into a prosperous territory of wealth and plenty, the home of many thousands of white people?

Slow as has been the progress of the Shoshones, they undoubtedly are far better off than when they first came to our historical knowledge. These members of the Wind River Branch of the Shoshones are fully 100 miles east of the country that was occupied by their people when white men first came here. For many years they were under old Chief Washakie, a warrior and natural leader, courageous, wise and progressive. He died two years ago, at the age of ninety-six, and was buried with military honors by the United States troops at Fort Washakie. Washakie was remarkably successful in his wars with other tribes, but he had the wisdom to recognize the power of the white men and to cultivate their friendship by acts of kindness. Gen. Grant appreciated this to such an extent that he sent him as a gift a beautiful saddle. The officer in charge of the post drew up the troop and made a formal presentation of the saddle to Washakie, who said nothing.

"Washakie," said the officer, "when the white men get a gift, they give thanks. What are you going to say?"

"When white men give thanks, they do it with their head," replied Washakie, "and the head has a tongue. Indian give thanks with his heart, and the heart has no tongue."

Largely through the influence of the Rev. Mr. Roberts, Washakie was baptized, and remained to the time of his death a faithful advocate of the church and school.

In his work Mr. Roberts has been helped by the Rev. Mr. Coolidge, a full-blood Arapahoe, who was captured thirty years ago, educated in Bishop Whipple's school, and has since been preaching to his own people as well as to those who had been formerly his captors. Quietly and unostentatiously, Mr. Roberts has gone on with his work all these years. He helped to start the Government school, and he afterwards founded this church school, where he has borne noble witness to the religion of Jesus Christ, and is beloved by all who know him.

It is impossible to estimate the true value of such a life as this faithful missionary to the Indians. Through storm and sunshine he has taught in the school, ministered to the sick, and visited the tepees. Many an interesting tale has he gathered from his long experience among the Indians. Infanticide is still practiced to some extent by the Indians; but it grows out of superstition. Some time back, an Indian child was taken sick and its heathen parents sent for a "Medicine Man," who told them an evil spirit had taken the form of their child who was destroyed, and the only thing that would prevent the death of the rest of the family was to take this child and leave it far away in the fastnesses of the great Wind River mountains, to perish with hunger and cold. Fortunately, a Christian Indian was able to save the child from so awful a fate. Many of the Indians are beginning to adopt civilized ways, under the influence of the Government and the instruction of such valued friends as Mr. Roberts.

One of Mr. Roberts' helpers is an Indian chief named Mooyoovah. He is a Shoshone of more than usual intelligence. His camp lies far up towards the deep and mysterious canyons and snow-crowned heights of the Wind River mountains. Here Mr. Roberts comes on Sunday to look into the eager faces of those who have never had a full understanding of that strange and beautiful story of the love of the great Father. Mooyoovah said to me: "Once I rode around on horseback like other Indians. One day I said to myself 'This is no good.' I saw white men work, raise hay, keep cattle, horses, have good warm house. I took some land, maybe five acres—I laugh now. It took five Indians to work my plough, two at plough handles, one to each horse, one to tell the rest what to do. Next year, I got better land and more of it, and worked it better. Then I got cattle and got other Indians help me work my land. Then I build log house, and Mr. Roberts come every Sunday and talk to me and my people about the great Father. I tell my people all the time to do right, and listen to what the good white men tell about the great Father's love to all his children."

The sun dance, the wolf, the bear, and the ghost dances are all observed after a fashion, but are fast passing away.

I find day dreamers among these Indians, old men and women reactionists, who are looking for Messiahs to come over the mountains and bring back the buffalo, and drive the white man back over the seas; who hate the white man and all his ways; who use their whole influence against the attempt to civilize the Indian. These are happily a diminishing quantity. All true friends of the Indians must realize that the very life of the people is dependent on their Christianization.

IN FRONT OF THE MISSION SCHOOL

NEW YORK'S POOR AT CHRISTMAS

THERE is much suffering among the poor of the metropolis this winter, on account of the scarcity of work and the number of idle men. New York, with its usual generosity, remembered the poor at Christmas-time, and gave abundantly to make the festival a pleasant one, even among the humblest. The Salvation Army's Christmas programme included the giving of 30,000 dinners in the Grand Central Palace, and the Volunteers of America announced that 10,000 dinners and 2,000 packages of clothing would be distributed. These dinners and packages were for poor families.

The Christmas scheme of the New York American was a stupendous one. Its appeals for help were responded to so generously, that its programme arranged provided for more than 100,000 poor children, not only with dinners, but with clothing and toys. Ten thousand baskets, each containing sufficient food for a Christmas dinner for a family of ten persons, were distributed through various missions, settlements, charitable organizations and institutions, irrespective of creed or nationality. The American generously gave twenty-five of the baskets to the Bowery Mission, which were gratefully received. In addition to these, the Mission prepared 1,500 boxes for distribution, packed with good things for Christmas dinners.

The men and women who come to the Mission are very grateful for the help they receive through the generosity of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. If the contributors to the fund could see how the faces of these poor people light up on receiving their gifts, the givers would be doubly blessed, and no Christmas celebration could be more appropriate than this universal charity.

To Destroy the Mormon Evil

THE MORMON TABERNACLE

The Mormon Hierarchy in Utah and Other States -- Its Polygamy and Political Absorption -- How the Evil May be Crushed

Specially Contributed to "The Christian Herald"

By Ex-U. S. Senator GEO. F. EDMUNDS

THE MORMON TEMPLE

WITH the religious, political or other beliefs, real or professed, this article has nothing to do. The liberty of thinking, the freedom of faith, and the right of independent opinion, are inherent and sacred, and are, happily, beyond the power of compulsory control. A tyrannical and unjust government may indeed punish (as has often happened in all ages and many countries) the persons who entertain them, but it is powerless to destroy or change them.

But conduct—action—is a totally different thing. Even the exercise of the freedom of speech, so absolutely essential to the very existence of any government in which the people have any rights, is conduct and action, and is, therefore, as all sane men agree, the proper subject of legal restraint. It must not, therefore, incite to the violation of the rights and peaceful security of others, or to the commission of offences against the lawful social order and morality of the community. There can be neither equal rights nor equal liberty without the ready recognition and observance of these truths. Liberty without law and order is first anarchy, and then, always, the despotism of the few over the many. The greatest menace and danger to our country and to the true liberty and safety of its people at present is the unprevented and unpunished open violation of the laws. Laws in this country are the mandates of the people; the omission or refusal of the administrators of the laws to enforce them fully and constantly is, in effect, being accessory to their violation.

The foregoing and self-evident or demonstrable propositions are stated as introductory to the subject of this article, although they apply to many other important events taking place almost continually in the United States.

In the year 1848, the Mormon hierarchy established itself in the valley of Salt Lake; in 1850 the Territory of Utah was organized under an act of Congress, and included more than eighty thousand square miles. The absolute political and social sway of the hierarchy existed there, with Brigham Young at its head, and polygamy was practiced, encouraged, and, indeed, enjoined. It had been condemned by the original "Book of Mormon," but a new "revelation" in 1843 to Joseph Smith, the then "First President," reversed the earlier commandment, and provided for polygamy as profitable for morals and edification in this life, and of large influences in the heavenly bliss of the future state. It having been found that polygamy could not safely be practiced and defended in Missouri, where the hierarchy was at first established, it retreated with its subjects and adherents to Illinois, where, soon, it caused the printing office of a newspaper that opposed polygamy to be destroyed; but finding that the people of Illinois would not tolerate the practice or the means taken to maintain it, the hierarchy migrated to Salt Lake, as before stated, and established itself as a supreme government in every respect. After the formation of the Territory of Utah, Brigham Young became its first governor, but when his lawfully appointed successor arrived at Salt Lake, Young refused to turn over the government, claiming a dominion derived from the Lord, and the lawful officers were driven away. At last he was compelled to give up the public power he had unlawfully retained, but his power as First President, and polygamy as revealed to Joseph Smith, were maintained on a firm foundation as an institution of the Church, and flourished and grew as such. The absolute mastership of the First Presidency over the social and political conduct of the Mormons continued, and it may be justly concluded, from the known history of the Territory and State for the more than half a century of their existence, still continues.

In 1862 Congress passed an Act forbidding and punishing bigamy in the Territories, etc., but it was rarely if ever acted upon, and, probably, no conviction or even prosecution for that offence took place in Utah from the time of the passage of the Act until after the 22d of March, 1882, when Congress passed a new and more adequate Act on the subject, though, possibly, there may have been some sporadic instance of such prosecutions. After the passage of the Act of 1882, and until after the passage of the supplementary Act of 1887 (the passage of both having been opposed by the hierarchy), the administrative and judicial officers of the United States in the Territory of Utah steadily and persistently proceeded with their duties in the prosecution and trial of polygamous offences. Many convictions were obtained, many offenders fled from justice, and the open and defiant practice of polygamy, at least, very greatly diminished, and there was good ground for the belief that a firm and steady continuance of the administration of these laws would, within a reasonably brief period, completely eradicate an evil not only repugnant to the moral and social sense of all Christian people, but destructive of one of the chief corner-stones of civilized society. Thus in the year 1890, the calm and unremitting judgments of administrative justice had become too heavy to be borne, and so (it may be supposed through a new "revelation") the hierarchy put forth a manifesto declaring, as described in the amnesty proclamation of President Harrison (January 4, 1893): "The purpose of said Church no longer to sanction the practice of polygamous marriages, and calling upon all members and adherents of said Church to obey the laws of the United States in reference to said subject matter." This manifesto was followed in December, 1891, by a petition of the hierarchy addressed to President Harrison, to grant amnesty for past offences of a polygamous character, and pledging the members of the Mormon Church to a faithful obedience to the laws against plural marriages and unlawful cohabitation. It would have been more to the point to have prayed for indulgence, but that could be obtained in another way—by Statehood. The President was urged by influential and credulous Gentiles of Utah to grant the amnesty—which he did, with conditions and limitations — under the mistaken belief that the asserted change of heart and law in the Church was real and final. No one could then foresee that in the grand and expansive future of the Republic, the institution of polygamy in the rule of the Sultan of Sulu would exist under the flag of the United States.

Thus the hierarchy had obtained and made secure the first step toward its liberation from the laws of Congress against its hitherto "revealed" and favorite practices, and became enabled to prosecute, under favorable conditions, its scheme for complete and impregnable independence of the legislative, executive and judicial power of the United States respecting the internal affairs of the hoped-for State.

A bill to enable the people of Utah to form a State government, was introduced in the House of Representatives by the delegate from that Territory at the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, beginning March 4, 1893. It was passed by the House, and was sent to the Senate on the 18th of December of that year. It was passed by the Senate with amendments, and became a law on July 10, 1894. Desiring to prevent the new State from ever relapsing into the evils that had vexed the Territory of Utah and shocked nine-tenths of the people of the United States for more than fifty years, the Act of Congress required that the constitutional convention to be elected by the people of Utah should provide by ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, that "perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; Provided, that polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited." The Enabling Act also provided, that "all laws in force made by said Territory at the time of its admission into the Union shall be in force in said State." It did not enact that the laws of the United States providing for the prosecution, trial and punishment of polygamous marriages and unlawful cohabition in force at the time of admission, should be a part of the laws of the State until they should be altered or repealed by its Legislature, though the power of Congress was just as great in the one case as in the other.

The amnesty proclamation of President Harrison was followed, on the 27th of September, 1894, by a supplemental one of President Cleveland—the two together having the effect of restoring the whole body of offenders against the anti-polygamy legislation of Congress in the Territory to full civil and political rights, and so enabling them to carry on and benefit by the campaign for Statehood which was then beginning under the Enabling Act. Thus, every obstacle to the end so long sought for had been removed, and it only remained for the hierarchy to set up its State—a consummation it had been most adroitly struggling for through many years.

So set free, the rest was easy. A constitutional convention was elected and held, and on the 8th of May, 1895, it adopted a constitution, with an ordinance touching polygamy in conformity with the requirements of the Act. The constitution was submitted to the people and adopted, and the State government was completely established.

It will be noticed that the Act of Congress required no more than that the State constitution should prohibit polygamous or plural marriages. It did not require anything to make such prohibition effective, and it did not apply to anything except the mere ceremony of marriage. The Territory had, before the Enabling Act was passed, enacted a law substantially copying the first three sections of the Congressional Act of 1882 on the subject, but it had studiously omitted the administrative means provided in that Act for making the prohibition effective, the result of which was that Congress, by putting in force for the new State all Acts passed by the Territory, in effect approved the abrogation of the essential means provided by its own Act for the due prosecution of bigamy, polygamy and unlawful cohabitation.

The constitution of the new State did not even allow the territorial Act of 1892, above mentioned, to stand as it was enacted, but abolished the section against unlawful cohabitation by leaving the Act in force, only as applies to cases of polygamous marriage, that is, to the ceremony of marriage. If, in a prosecution for bigamy, the ceremonious marriage can not be proved, the case fails, no matter how many de facto wives the accused may be cohabiting with.

The Acts of Congress relating to the internal polity of the Territory, of course, instantly expired on the admission of the State to the Union. Its constitution only prohibited polygamous or plural marriages. It did not undertake to prohibit the natural and intended consequences, namely, plural cohabitation; and while it prohibited plural marriage, it did not provide for any punishment of it, and so it could have no effect until action by the State Legislature. But plural cohabitation was distinctly permitted by the constitutional abolition of that part of the territorial Acts applicable to it. The plural marriage once illegally contracted, the parties could thereafter hold the relation of husband and wife in legal innocence! The writer has not the laws of Utah at hand, to ascertain whether the Legislature of that State has ever, during the eight years of its existence, enacted any law providing for the punishment of the offences referred to; but such legislation is quite improbable.

The evidence so far obtained by the Senate Committee investigating the case of Senator Smoot, discloses that some, at least, of the chief rulers of the Mormon church have deliberately and continually carried on the practice of polygamy without prosecution or annoyance, in the face of their pledges made to two Presidents of the United States, and have set an example naturally and almost necessarily to be followed by their church members and adherents, without any danger of interference by the legislative or any other department of the government of the State of Utah. They know that Congress has no power, and that the State has no disposition to interfere.

The Committee investigation referred to has also developed evidence showing that the hierarchy continues to control the government of the State, and that the choice of officers, and their official actions in some degree, at least, are subject to its control. It can quite correctly say with the French king, I am the State. All this is consistent with more than half a century of its history, and should surprise nobody except those whose generous and confiding faith in promises, led them to believe that the settled polity of a great and powerful church organization would be or remain reversed, when that organization should become independent of the only power it had any reason to fear.

LOOKING DOWN MAIN STREET, SALT LAKE CITY

The practice of Mormon polygamy, and the political influence of the hierarchy have been gradually and steadily expanded into the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma, and into the States of Idaho, Wyoming, California and Oregon. This is a condition of things that should receive the most serious consideration of the great body of the citizens of our country, to whom both the institution of polygamy, and the interference or attempted interference of religious or professed religious organizations with the political autonomy of any republican country is abhorrent.

What then can be done toward destroying the evil? The National Constitution can be so amended as,

First, to prohibit polygamous marriages and plural cohabitation, and provide for their punishment, and,

Second, to require all persons taking office under the Constitution or laws of the United States or of any State, to take and subscribe an oath that he or she is not and will not be a member of any organization whatever, the laws, rules or nature of which require him or her to disregard his or her duty to support the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the several States.

These two provisions would, it is believed, have the effect, substantially, to eradicate the practice of polygamy in all the States and Territories alike, and would, likewise, prevent office holding, either under National or State jurisdiction, by persons who felt that they had any obligations of a civil or political character paramount to their obligations to the whole country or to their States.

The first suggested amendment would in no wise interfere with State sovereignty, unless the State itself should desire either to establish or tolerate polygamous practices, for each State could prohibit and punish the same acts against its sovereignty if it should (as it ought) choose to do so.

The second suggested amendment does not in the least interfere with the sovereignty of any State, but the rather supports it; and it would be inconvenient and troublesome only to persons really unfaithful to their whole country or to their State, or (as it ought to be), to any State or community which was willing that its chosen officers should be under obligations paramount to those they owe to their country, State or community.

[Ex-Senator Edmunds, in the foregoing recommendations, has pointed out the practical remedy for the Mormon evil. Now, let every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, after perusing the distinguished Senator's article, sit down and write to the United States Senator from the State in which the reader resides, a brief letter urging him to support, with his voice and vote, the recommendations suggested above. Write a similar letter to your Congressman. This is of the highest importance. By following this plan, Congress will be induced to take such action as is necessary to effectually check the Mormon evil, to suppress polygamy, and to prevent the Mormon Church from getting a foothold in our national government.

THE CASE OF SENATOR SMOOT

ON Dec. 20, the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections adjourned until Jan. 10. The evidence of the protestants in the Reed-Smoot investigation being all in, Senator Smoot will now begin his defence. The testimony of different witnesses thus far examined, has showed conclusively that polygamy among the Mormons is by no means a bygone institution. A long list was read of men who were known to be living with plural wives, and it is generally understood that numerous polygamous marriages have occurred since 1890.

One woman, born of Mormon parents in Utah, testified that her husband had another wife and family living on the next block. The witness was not quite certain whether her husband had still another wife.

United States Marshal Haywood, of Salt Lake City, who served the subpœnas issued by the committee, testified that all the persons who eluded him were reputed to be polygamists. Three of these, he said, were apostles, and had several wives each. Most of the people who had disappeared had violated both the laws of the Church and the law of the land, as they have been married to plural wives since the issue of the Woodruff manifesto.

C. M. Owen, agent for the Women's Interdenominational Association, testified before the committee that he had tried very hard to secure criminal prosecutions in Utah against polygamists whom he had run down; he had even tried to prosecute President Joseph F. Smith, on Smith's own testimony before the Senate Committee of the last session, but the authorities at Salt Lake City would not entertain the complaint. Mr. Owen further testified that although he did secure convictions in some flagrant cases, the fines were merely nominal. In some instances, he declared, public subscriptions were raised to pay the fines of convicted polygamists, and in one case the proceedings were quashed by the Supreme Court of Utah. Apostle Merrill has so far managed to evade the summons to appear at Washington This does not seem a very difficult matter should his family not wish him to be found, as it was brought out that Merrill had nine wives, forty-five children, and 107 grandchildren. Twenty-six of his children are married.

It was stated in the testimony of Apostle John Henry Smith, that, while taking the "endowments" was not strictly essential to a marriage ceremony in the Temple, it was usually required. This witness thought that Senator Smoot had taken the endowments; he was not sure, although as far as he knew, all the apostles had taken them.

That the Smoot forces are making a bitter fight, was evidenced when Attorney Worthington, Mr. Smoot's counsel, objected to the introduction of certain Mormon books. After a spirited debate, it was decided by the chairman, Senator Burrows, that extracts from all books used by the Mormons might be offered, as tending to establish the Mormon doctrine.

Some very remarkable testimony was given by Apostle John Henry Smith, one of the most prominent leaders of the Church. After being repeatedly cornered by questions, he was forced to admit that he regarded polygamy as right, and further declared his intention of living in polygamous relations, in spite of the fact that, by so doing, he was violating the law of the land and that of the Church. He was not concerned, he said, about the polygamous practices of his brethren, and attached no importance to the fact that such practices might bring discredit upon the Church. In the same breath, he declared that the Mormon Church was "rigidly obeying the laws of the land."

It was also shown that the Mormon Church has a regularly established system of courts, where business questions are tried, and decisions rendered, which both parties must accept and abide by, or be excommunicated.

A very important witness—Mr. C. M. Owen—stated that although they did not dare to avow their belief, or have it known, there was hardly a settlement where there were not some Mormons who were opposed to polygamy.

From these people the witness had got much information, upon his promise not to betray his informant.

William Balderston, editor of the Boise Statesman, said that it was his opinion that polygamous living had increased in Idaho in the last dozen years.

A Rationalistic Flurry

IT is a well-known fact that the defection of one minister of religion makes more noise in the world than the virtues of a host of ministers who remain true and steadfast. We are not surprised, therefore, to find that the recent utterances of a certain clergyman before the Presbyterian Assembly, and of another before a body of Harvard students, have given occasion for a great deal of comment in the religious world. Dr. Carter's utterances, however, as he afterwards qualified them, sink into insignificance when contrasted with those of Dr. Lyman Abbott, who, in his twofold capacity of preacher and writer, has for many years been recognized as one of the foremost leaders of religious thought in America.

It has been charged broadly that Dr. Abbott denied the existence of a Great First Cause; that he repudiated "the old idea of man's relation to God," that he held the Bible to be merely "the record of man's greatest achievement and aspiration in the religious life;" that "Christ is in history what the Bible is in literature—the supreme expression of the divine idea;" and that that idea is the omnipresent energy which we call "nature." Incidentally, this broad repudiation would involve the Creation, the Fall, the Saviour's office as Redeemer and Mediator, and every substantial part of the fabric of the Christian religion. Christ's mission, his whole work on earth, and his crowning sacrifice on the Cross, would become mere human incidents, possessing no special significance for the human race.

But Dr. Abbott seems to have been grievously misunderstood. At any rate, finding a storm of criticism raging, he has wisely become his own interpreter, and has now declared that his sermon to the Harvard students was not as has been publicly represented. "I am not an atheist," he explains. "I believe in God and I believe in the Divinity of Jesus Christ. God is not an unconscious force, but a Being who thinks, wills and feels. The conception of the Eternal Presence is better expressed by the words, 'Our Father,' than by any other I know. It is because He dwells in us that God is our Father." The Bible, he holds, "was written by men to whom we owe visions of the Divine, which ordinary men could never obtain." Christ was "the supremest manifestation of God in human history. As Jesus Christ thought and felt and acted, we can know that the invisible God is always thinking and feeling and acting." This declaration must be accepted as a definite refutation of the current impression, widely announced, that Dr. Abbott had stripped off the last vestige of his Christian ministry and become an avowed rationalist—a pantheist.

The pantheist will tell you that he sees God in every flower and shrub and tree, in the cloud and the brook, in every living and inanimate thing; so does the believer; but he sees more, for he can discern, behind all these, the Divine Creator. The pantheist will tell you that these were the product of the "universal energy;" but the believer perceives, with the eye of faith, strengthened by revelation, the great Original, who, in the beginning, "created the heavens and the earth," and who governs all.

Pantheism has been variously defined. One writer calls it the belief that "God and the whole universe are one and the same substance—one universal being," and that man is only a modification of the same substance; that God is not only the soul of the world but is the world. It is the absolute reverse of realism in religion. Creation and a First Cause, as the source of law and order, are effaced, and all development comes through universal energy and evolution. Everything is a part or fraction of everything else and all things hang together.

It is a world-old belief. The Hindus, the Egyptians, the Greeks, were familiar with its tenets. All through the early Christian age, the Church had to contend with various forms of pantheism, and in later times it has appeared so frequently that it may be said to have been continuously active in its efforts to destroy the Christian religion. But in our days the pantheist will find few to follow him.

There may be some whose spiritual natures will be satisfied with a "cult" that substitutes for God the Father a hazy, impressionistic, intangible, unidentifiable Something which they cannot define; that would transform Christianity into a moral philosophy no better than Confucianism, and that would make of human life a dark enigma with chaos as a background; but they will be few indeed. Pride of intellect has led eminent men into many errors in the past and will doubtless do so again. Noble minds have been dazzled with the ambitious dream of a leadership that would focus the intellectual forces of the age on some great purpose. Thus allured, and encouraged also by the false impression received from a few flattering followers—themselves deeply infatuated with the "religion of nature"—that the whole Church is impregnated with the virus of unbelief, a decisive step may be taken, which the Christian world must view with sincere pity rather than with trepidation. Far from being a peril to the Church, and a menace to Christianity, such defections, while they emphasize man's weakness, only serve to make the true believer take a firmer hold on faith.

To the Christian, who has gone through the fires of spiritual experience, it is not necessary to prove the existence of God, nor man's need of a Saviour. He knows, by an experience that no intellectual discussion can shake, that God is a Being and not an energy, and he can say with Job—"I know that my Redeemer liveth." To the Christian, the Deity is no lifeless energy, no impersonality, but a real Father, to whom he can come with all his joys and his sorrows, and who will never fail him. To him all the learned phraseology of the schoolmen and all their speculations are but as empty air bubbles, or as mist that is easily dispelled by the sun.

Dr. Abbott has looked over the whole field of speculative theology, and few men in our day have so thoroughly tested all the claims of the "liberal thinkers," the evolutionists and the rationalists. Setting all human philosophies aside, the conclusion he reaches is that the Great Father is over all, that Christ is Divine, the Bible a revelation, and "that faith in God cannot be destroyed!"

Let us be thankful that the rationalistic storm is over, and that the sun of Truth is again shining clearly in the heavens.

Look out for the GREATEST SYMPOSIUM of the YEAR in next week's issue.

New Year Resolutions

GOOD resolutions are in order at the beginning of a new year. Too often they are broken long before its close; but the discouragement which failure involves ought not to produce despair. "Try again," is the motto for every earnest, faithful man. The failures of the past have brought experience; we know our dangers we are better prepared for the conflict; and the promise of Divine help still holds good. There is everything to encourage us to new effort. Sorrow over past lapses ought never to lead us to lose faith in God, or in ourselves. The task is set before us of rising out of the dominion of our fleshly nature, out of the anarchy of lawless passions, into the higher order of the soul under spiritual control. Every man has to perform that task for himself. It rests with him whether he shall be a mere animal, or become one of the sons of God. Our Father in heaven sees the conflict and sympathizes with every valiant fighter. To everyone who determines to rise, to shake himself free from the bondage of evil, he holds out the helping hand.

When the man falls, when he degenerates from the spiritual to the sensual, God waits to see what he will do. Will he lie still and grovel, content with the ease and comfort of the lower life? Will he seek escape from the weary conflict by suicide? Or, will he, undaunted by his failure, rise from the ground and renew the struggle? If he will do that, if he still holds fleshly indulgence his enemy, and determines while life lasts to wage war against it, God, who has infinite patience with his poor weak creatures, still remains his friend and gives him renewed strength. Therefore, let none be discouraged by the failures of the past year, with the mournful list of his broken resolutions, but, like a brave man, again put on the armor, and relying on the help promised him, go forth again to battle.

How to Deal With Mormonism

IN another part of this issue, we print a very able article from the pen of Ex.-Senator Edmunds on the Mormon problem. There is probably no other man among our American statesmen so competent as he to deal with this burning question. Eminent as an authority on Constitutional law and thoroughly familiar with the whole subject of Mormonism—the distinguished Senator performs a valuable public service in disclosing, as he now does, the only practical legislative remedy that can be applied to rid the nation of this gigantic evil, which has afflicted it during half a century of shame and heartburnings.

We invite the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to supplement Senator Edmunds' work, by bringing it to the personal attention of every Senator and Representative in Congress. Better than petitions and mass-meetings would be an avalanche of letters from our friends, every one of whom should urge the member of Congress from his district, and the Senatorial representatives also, to actively support such a measure as Mr. Edmunds suggests.

Some Uses of Worry

WE are so accustomed to condemning every one who worries, as wholly lacking in faith and utterly given over to folly, that we are a little unfair. Why should people sit down without a shade of solicitude when events important to them are trembling in the balance? How can they, if, for instance, there is a mortgage on the farm, and danger of its being foreclosed? The man who does everything he can to raise the needed money, and finally fails, cannot but pass through an extreme amount of plain, hard, wearing worry. Though one may be resigned to God's will and accept it without a murmur, yet if a dear one is in the clutches of a fatal malady, some worry is inevitable. The uses of worry are the uses of a spur to greater action, to more earnest effort. To be roused from supineness and urged to endeavor, some natures need the pricking of worry.

A great deal of very pleasant and some very shallow philosophy has been written on the subject of worry. There are writers who tell us not to worry, no matter what happens; but to preserve our calm and equipoise under any and all circumstances. Fortunate indeed is the man or woman who is so situated that worry knocks at the door in vain.

Yet habitual worry is inexcusable and sinful, and should be checked. As there are certain remedies so dangerous that they are kept under lock and key, so there are some mental conditions, of which worry is one, that are not wholesome, unless regulated with the utmost care. The man who is always worrying is weak, and apt to be faithless. The man who never worries may be indifferent to his obligations, and to that extent dishonorable.

The War in the East

ATTEMPTS are being made by Japan to intercept the fleet from the Baltic, which Russia has despatched to relieve Port Arthur. One squadron of the fleet, under Rear-Admiral Volkersahm, is proceeding by way of the Suez Canal. The illustration on this page shows that squadron, carefully watched by Egyptian boats, under command of an English captain, on its way through the canal. The other Russian squadron is taking the long route around the Cape of Good Hope. It is under the command of Admiral Rojestvensky. It is expected that the two squadrons will combine at some port which is at present kept secret, but is thought by naval experts to be a small coral island named Minicoy, near Ceylon. Admiral Togo, of the Japanese Navy, is manœuvering to prevent the junction of the two squadrons. He has forty vessels under his command, and it is believed he would be able to destroy the squadrons singly, if he can find them before they unite. Admiral Kamimura, with a fleet of powerful cruisers, is also searching. At last reports he was at Singapore, proceeding in a westerly direction. Intense interest in the result of these naval manœuvres is displayed both in Russia and Japan. The Japanese believe that their two fleets will be more than a match for the Russian combined squadrons, but in the event of their attacking them singly, they are confident of success; the genius of their admirals being far superior to that of the Russians.

The Japanese besieging Port Arthur have achieved an important victory. On Dec. 19, they attacked the fortifications on Keekwan mountain, a commanding position, from which they can reach the section of Port Arthur on the higher ground. The hero of the attack was General Samejima, an authority on military engineering. He seems to have surprised the Russian force, as he did not begin by a bombardment. He fired an immense mine of dynamite under the fortifications, and then led a fierce assault on the works, capturing seven large guns, and a large store of ammunition. The Japanese now hold five of the seven protecting forts.

THE RUSSIAN BALTIC FLEET AT THE SUEZ CANAL

The cost in life of this attack was very heavy on both sides; in the naval battle which is impending, it is horrible to contemplate; while a third scene of slaughter must result, when Gen. Kouropatkin receives the 200,000 men which are being sent to him, to enable him to make his aggressive movement from the north. Both nations are suffering grievously, and though Japan is consoled for her losses of life by the victories won, her families are mourning over unnumbered bereavements. The Russians, too, have to bemoan the death of many brave men, and, in addition, the loss of prestige. The little nation it despised, has proved a powerful and capable enemy.

In that day they shall roar against them like the roaring of the sea: and if one look unto the land, behold darkness and sorrow (Isaiah 5 : 30).

Killed By a Souvenir

A press dispatch from Detroit, Mich., describes a deplorable accident, which resulted from a friendly gift. A lady received, some time ago, from her brother, an officer in the United States Navy, a present of a one-pound shell, presumably a relic of the war with Spain. It was supposed to be empty, and had been lying about the house without any idea of its destructive character. A few days ago the lady was preparing for a Christmas celebration for her two children. She was hanging some portieres, which were to conceal the Christmas presents until the moment when they were to be revealed in all their glory. She needed some tacks to loop the curtains, and having found these, she looked around for the tack hammer. She could not find it, but seeing the shell lying near, she used that for the purpose. Instantly there was a loud report and an explosion that filled the room with smoke. When the family ran upstairs to find out what had happened, they saw her body, literally torn to pieces, lying among the debris of the toys. What must be the self-reproach of the giver of that destructive present! It had been prepared to kill an enemy, yet by his carelessness it had destroyed his sister. Unhappily, nature takes no account of motive. Mischief may be done by the well-meaning as well as by the malignant. Therefore it behooves all to be careful of what they do and say.

As a madman who casteth firebrands, arrows and death, so is the man that deceiveth his neighbor and saith, Am not I in sport? (Prov. 26 : 18, 19).

No Reforms in Russia

Heartfelt disappointment is felt throughout Russia at the Czar's determination to reject the programme of reform prepared at the recent meeting of the Zemstvos. It was hoped that these local governing bodies would have had so much influence as to sway the mind of the Emperor. That he has considered the proposals there is no doubt, but he has yielded to the advice of his uncles and his ministers in rejecting them. It is well known that these powerful statesmen have a horror of a free parliament and of the interference of the people in the affairs of the government. In the daily councils held under the presidency of the Czar, Prince Mirsky strongly urged the granting of some measure of reform, but he was overruled by the men wedded to the present order. They contended that Prince Mirsky's policy was dangerous, on the ground that the demands of the Zemstvoists were subversive of the essential principles of the autocracy. In the opinion of the council it was not the time to entertain proposals looking to a change in the existing form of government while the war is in progress, and it has been decided to discourage political agitation. The Emperor's reply was still more emphatic. He wrote: "I consider the action of the President of the Zemstvos to be presumptuous and tactless. Questions of State administration are of no concern to the Zemstvos, whose functions and rights are clearly defined by the law." The answer reminds us of the conduct of that other young king, who, in ancient times, saw his kingdom dismembered by the display of similar arrogance.

When Israel saw that the king would not hearken to them, the people answered the king, saying what portion have we in David? . . . And Israel rebelled (II. Chron. 10 : 16, 19).

A Dog Decides a Case

In a police court in Brooklyn last week, a puzzling case was being tried. It was to decide the ownership of a dog. There was a great deal of contradictory evidence. The man who had the animal in his possession brought witnesses to prove that he had purchased it from a reputable dog-fancier, that he had paid the tax upon it and that he had owned it for a long time. On the other hand, a lady declared that she had owned the dog from puppyhood, and that she had lost it nearly a year ago, and having repeatedly advertised for it without result, believed it to have been stolen. Both claimants were sure as to the identity of the dog and insisted that there could be no doubt about the ownership. Finally the judge ordered the dog to be sent for and that it should be produced in court in a basket. A man was accordingly despatched for it, and it was brought in as the judge ordered. When the cover was removed, the dog stood for a moment looking around in astonishment, but his confusion speedily disappeared. Running toward the lady who claimed him, he leaped upon her, licking her hands, and with joyous yelps giving evidence of his delight in seeing her again. The judge was convinced by this display of canine affection, and awarded the dog to the lady he so evidently loved. It would be well if the same test of affection could be safely applied to some who claim to belong to Christ. In our day, as in the days of the ancient prophet, God has often reason to complain of the forgetfulness of his people.

The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people do not consider (Isa. 1:3).

BRIEF NOTES

The Turkish Government has ordered the authorities of the provinces of Angora, Trebizonde and Oidu, to restore to the American Bible Society the copies of the Bible which were recently seized. They have also been ordered to make no more seizures.

A friend of the American Bible Society offers to be one of twenty to give $5,000 to its funds, if the other nineteen can be found by April, 1905.

Rev. C. A. Johnson, missionary of the Lake George Baptist Association, has held successful evangelical services at Bolton Landing and Adirondack, N. Y. In the meeting at Bolton Landing, about twenty-five persons indicated a desire to begin the Christian life.

Rev. J. L. Jarrett sends gratifying news from Peru. He says: "From all parts of the country have come messages, reports, and requests, showing that there is a great desire to know the truth. Colporteurs have visited them, and a circle of believers exists in each place.

"It is no small discovery now given to the world by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt," says the Independent, "of, perhaps, the oldest known manuscript fragment of the New Testament, found on papyrus in Egypt. It contains some five chapters of Hebrews, and is assigned to the early part of the fourth century."

The American Board's report shows that the donations for the year were $802,618—an increase of $5,500 over the regular gifts of any preceding year. This gain is especially noteworthy, as it follows one of $40,000 a year ago, and makes the gain in donations in two years about $55,000.

A Ray for Each Day from the Sun of Righteousness, is the title of a useful booklet, containing a text of good cheer for every day in the year. They have been selected by Dr. H. Allen Tupper, who has taken special care that the texts are of a bright and inspiring character. The book, which is small enough to be carried in the pocket, will prove a treasury of Gospel Sunshine to every reader. Price ten cents, including postage. THE HEART OF THE WORLD

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF OPENING CHAPTERS

Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., of the aristocratic St. Cecilia Metropolitan Church, is a pastor with broad humanitarian views of life. He has found time amid the duties of his ministry to write a book, entitled, The Christian Socialist, which has just been published under the nom de plume of "Mark Burns." It excites a tremendous sensation. His secret of the authorship is known only to Miss Mildred Rodney, his betrothed, who has divined it. The book excites mingled praise and antagonism, and is the topic of the hour. The conservative element denounce it as dangerous to society. Judge Rodney is especially bitter. Next winter, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton is chosen as bishop. A distinguished audience assembles in St. Cecilia's, to witness the consecration. At the critical moment, the pastor makes an open avowal of the authorship of the offending book. Bishops, clerics, and audience are stricken dumb with amazement. His ecclesiastical career is regarded as ended. Miss Rodney, notwithstanding some parental opposition, consents to marry Stanton, and the two begin to face the world together bravely.

Meanwhile, a great strike is going on at Lenox, and Stanton is invited to address the Union men, by Bruce Harvey, their president. He advocates Christian love and forbearance, instead of violence, but the meeting is stampeded by the news of a riot at the mills. Stanton and Harvey go there with the crowd, but cannot preserve order. In the riot several are killed and many injured. Stanton rescues a poor negro worker from the furious mob, but is himself badly hurt in doing so. He and Harvey become fast friends. Harwood, and Wrightam are two millionaire mill-owners, whose hard and oppressive measures have embittered the workers. Stanton resolves to plead with them for a better understanding, as both are church members and professing Christians. He calls on Wrightam, but meets with a decided rebuff. With Harwood he has more success, and the two become good friends. Harwood has a great domestic sorrow, which takes the sweetness out of all his business triumphs. He leaves his wealthy home and friends, and disguised, goes to work as a mill-hand.

Stanton meanwhile is becoming well known as an advocate of Christian Socialism, and is a frequent lecturer. He meets many queer characters among the workers, and much appreciation. The troubles at Lenox continue, and he arrives there one day just in time to find a mob about to burn a negro who is accused of murder. Stanton determines to thwart the lynchers, but is knocked senseless, and the negro is burned. Next day the real culprits are found, and the negro victim is shown to have been wholly innocent. There is a popular revulsion of feeling in favor of Stanton. On the following Sunday he preaches in one of the leading pulpits, by invitation, and takes the lynching for his topic.

"CERTAINLY," Mr. Stanton continued, "if anyone needed to have the balance on his side it was the poor man, not the peer. In a Christian social order, a man's need of a common necessity would be a large factor to consider in the matter of price charged him for it. In the existing order, the man's need is not taken into the account, only his ability to order a large quantity and pay for it.

"In general, Christian Socialism would socialize all common needs, on the principle that it is universally good social economy to do so. We have already socialized the post-office, the public schools, the fire department, the lighting and heating of town and cities, the common roads, the public buildings, the public parks, and many other forms of public need. We are all Socialists in the matter of the post-office, even if it does not pay expenses; even if there are frauds and irregularities and dishonesty connected with its management. The people will see to the righting of those abuses, as it is being done. But who would ever wish to place the post-office in the hands of a private trust for the purpose of private gain? Who would like to see the public schools managed for pay by the United States Public School Corporation? Yet the education of our children by the State, at all the people's expense, is not more necessary or just than their physical and mental nourishment in other directions. As long as selfish and unscrupulous landlords can get high rent for low tenements, the people who have to live in tenements will suffer an injustice, which could not exist if sanitary dwellings were the property of the people themselves. It is simply a matter of economic saving and justice, that the things which all mankind has to have for its physical and mental welfare should not be made subject to individual greed. The rights of property are not greater than the rights of man. They are second, not first.

"5. It follows as a natural order of belief, that Christian Socialism does not believe in the personal acquisition of large personal fortunes. This follows from two reasons. If the great necessities of the world were once made the common property of the people, it would be impossible for any man to amass millions of money for himself. Even in the case of men who live under the present social conditions, who have acquired many millions of dollars and are willing to use the money for good objects, it is not possible for an individual to so distribute the vast sums for the general good in such a way as to add to the general welfare of the world, as if the same amount of wealth were distributed through the lives of the thousands of people who have toiled with either hand or brain to make that wealth. In the second place, the individual millionaire is not so happy or so useful a man as the one who has simply enough for the necessary development of his life. The happiest people in the world are neither the very poor nor the very rich. Too great poverty means misery. Too great wealth means the same. As a general thing, the unhappiest and most discontented people all over the world, are the people at the extremes of society. The golden mean of happiness does not depend on gold for its cause. It is a naturally eternal result of causes which are always the same and always will be. To restrict a man's personal wealth, create an order of society making it impossible for a man ever to become a millionaire, would be no injustice; it would be the beginning of happiness to countless men who now heap up riches, and, after getting them, have no pleasure in them. It is eternally true, as Jesus said, 'A man's life does not consist in the abundance of the things that he possesses.' It is also his teaching that man should not lay up for himself treasures on the earth. Some Christians believe this command applied only to the Christians in Jesus' own lifetime, and was not intended for a rule of life for all time. I wish to say that I myself differ from this view, and believe Jesus meant the command to extend in comprehensive manner over all the centuries, and apply to all his disciples alike. It was not a religious precept necessary only to the special surroundings of the early Christian, but a profound economic statement, which, if followed out by the Christian, would result in greater power, development, and happiness than can possibly be found in any search after wealth or any actual possession of the same.

"6. Christian Socialism also holds as one of its teachings in a practical programme, what may be called the doctrine of a 'new patriotism.'

"One of the most astonishing propositions ever made to the British taxpayer, was made by Sir Norman Lockyer in his recent presidential address before the British Association. In that address, he advocated the grant by the government of $120,000,000 for university extension and education in Great Britain. That is just the amount spent last year on the British navy.

"The New York Independent for October 1, 1903, commenting on this address, says, 'He (Sir Norman Lockyer), would borrow this sum, and put it once for all in buildings and endowments where it would be permanently profitable. It would be a single appropriation for the production of brains, and would not have to be repeated. Battle-ships wear out in a few years and go to the scrap heap; buildings and endowments maintain an endless profit. But let us make the comparison which Sir Norman Lockyer suggests between the expenditure of $120,000,000 once for the production of trained brains, and that of the same amount every year for the building of battle-ships. Which is the most profitable investment of a nation's surplus wealth? And what is a battle-ship, which costs as much to build as it does to endow a university? It is a temporary, fragile thing, made to smash and be smashed, soon out of style, like a woman's bonnet, and equally thrown aside, when, after a few years, worn out. It is the expression of the destructive, the cursed side of national character and life, that which makes for loss and ruin, or at best, for defense against wanton attack. It may be necessary to build war vessels, we do not deny it, but Sir Norman Lockyer is right in saying that brains are a better defense than battle-ships, and better worth building.' Amen! says the lover of his country who believes in the teachings of Christ. That teaching is all towards the reign of peace among men. But if it is true that we have not yet got to the place in our Christian civilization where battle-ships and navies can be dispensed with, let us at least be true enough to our faith to insist upon it, that if the United States spends millions every year in building machines to kill, it should also appropriate as many more millions to preserve life, and educate men and women into good Christian citizens. The State already appropriates public money in vast sums to maintain jails, penitentiaries, asylums, hospitals, and poorhouses. The same amount of money spent on establishing kindergartens, universities, training schools, and in paying living wages to the best teachers, would reduce the cost of these other institutions by that law of prevention which is so inexorable. Yet the teaching force of America, with all the country's mighty increase in wealth, is not any better paid for its work than it was twenty-five years ago. With all our bragging prosperity there is one class of society in America that has not benefited—the salaried class, especially teachers and ministers. I know a man who has been in the same pulpit for twenty years. He is more than an average preacher and an exceptional pastor. When he went to that parish, the church numbered two hundred. His salary was $1,000 a year. The church now numbers over six hundred. In the twenty years' time of a faithful, self-sacrificing ministry, that church has increased the salary to $1,500. That was over eight years ago, and the salary remains at that figure. This is not due to the fact that the church does not appreciate the man. But his membership is made up almost entirely from the salaried class, and while almost every other class of society has had some benefit from the prosperous years, the salaried class, like the minister, gets no more, and the cost of living has largely increased, so that what are called properous times are really hard times for large numbers of the most useful citizens; the educated, thoughtful Christian patriots of America, who are not the money-seeking people, but are among the solid, useful servants of society, who are not paid fair wages for the service rendered.

"This is as true of teachers as of ministers. I know a high-school principal who, ten years ago, was paid $1,600 a year. He has grown in his important position. He is ten times more capable as a public servant now than he was ten years ago. Yet he gets no more pay, and during a period of ten years' uncomplaining service, he has twice been asked if he could not work for less.

"The new patriotism would place brains before battle-ships, and brains before commercial supremacy. It would magnify the service of its public servants in the ministry, and give a living wage sufficient to ensure against anxiety or future want. It is, of course, true, and always will be, that neither the minister nor the teacher are in their professions to make money. They practically say to the world when they enter their professions, 'we are not money-seekers. We labor for the love of the service.' But under the present social order, it is not fair to ask a minister to do his work without sufficient tools, or a teacher to do his on such insufficient margin that his service is marred by anxiety. Christian Socialism would rank the teacher above the warrior, who is cared for in his old age by the government. Who does the more lasting service? At any rate, if the government pensions those who risked their lives in the physical war, it ought to provide liberally for the efficiency of its force of teachers who are helping to preserve the Republic intact by their loyal, intelligent, self-sacrificing education of the boys and girls who are soon to be the statesmen and builders of the land. It would simply be an act of wise commercial economy for the State to increase the salaries of its teachers, and dignify their value in every possible way to the State.

"The new patriotism would also, under Christian Socialism, declare its protest against many false forms of patriotic expression, notably, the celebration of our great national festivities or commemorative days.

"The Fourth of July celebration has become a distinct absurdity, without any serious educating purpose; a day given over to senseless noise, dissipation, athletic and theatrical performances for so much a piece, and a vast and unnecessary expenditure of money, that ought to be used to relieve distress or establish some permanent monument to the civic pride and virtue of the people."

Thus far in his address, Stanton had been listened to with the closest attention. The beautiful hall had been the scene of many wonderful gatherings and many remarkable utterances, but it is doubtful if any subject discussed there had provoked such intense interest as this. But Stanton had just finished his calm statement about the Fourth of July, when a finely-dressed man, sitting three rows from the edge of the platform, rose to his feet, turned about, and faced the audience.

His voice rang out plainly so that the farthest listener standing in the upper gallery heard the words:

"I protest against this address. It is full of dangerous teaching. It ought not to continue."

The audience leaned like one man toward the man who made this interruption, and for a moment a breathless stillness pervaded the house. In that silence Stanton, unmoved, almost coldly indifferent outwardly, remained facing the people, then he slowly stepped back and sat down by the chairman, who the same instant rose to his feet and went forward.

CHAPTER VI

THE momentary silence following the statement made by the man in the audience, was suddenly broken by voices that rose from every part of the Auditorium. There were cheers and hisses, Groups of men rose in different places and shouted. The man who had interrupted sprang up on a seat, and again his clear, resonant voice could be heard above the confusion.

"Hear me! Let me have a word!"

The noise died down. People seated themselves. The man stood on the seat waiting for silence. The chairman of the meeting, who had not yet spoken, stood attentively gazing at the man on the seat.

"I repeat, I protest against this address, and I have risen in my place to make my protest as public as possible. I do not believe in this doctrine, and I do not believe that the American people ought to listen to it."

He was suddenly interrupted by hisses and applause. Men rose in groups and shouted out various things. There were cries for "Stanton! Stanton!" He sat impassive and refused to rise. The chairman suddenly leaned over the edge of the platform and spoke to the man standing on the edge of the seat. The reporters used their pencils rapidly.

The audience, almost instantly, subsided again, in order to hear what the chairman was saying to the stranger.

"Are you a member of the League, sir?" the chairman was saying, in a calm, dispassionate tone.

"No, sir, I am not. But I feel as if a protest ought to be made against such teachings, and I make mine here and now. I am not the only one who feels this way. If I mistake not, there are hundreds here to-night who share my feelings."

He was interrupted again by hisses and applause. The chairman waited again to be heard.

"Sir, you have made your protest and have been heard. But I am the chairman of this meeting, and I protest against your interruption. Dr. Stanton was invited here by the Chicago Municipal League to speak on Christian Socialism. He is entitled to a respectful hearing. I call on this audience to give it to him. If you have any questions to ask, I have no doubt Dr. Stanton will be glad to answer them in the conference which has been advertised to follow this meeting."

"I have no questions to ask him," replied the gentleman, "but I do have this to say to him. Dr. Stanton, I don't doubt your sincerity; but that makes what you say all the more dangerous. I don't care to sit here and listen to any more. Here is my card, sir, if you care to call and talk it over with me."

He gave his card to an usher, who handed it up to the chairman, who gave it to Stanton. Immediately the man walked out in the aisle and started to go up towards the lobby. Groups of men around him rose and went out at the same time. The papers next morning said that three or four hundred retired. The chairman, a shrewd, cool-headed young man, made a careful estimate of the number, and counted two hundred and eighty-nine.

As these scattering groups were going out, someone up in the highest gallery started "America." The tune was caught up by the audience, and the volume of its music rolled up like a thunder rumbling. People who had been standing up began to take the seats of those who had gone out. When the singing ceased, someone shouted, "Recess is over. Stanton! Stanton!"

Everybody laughed, and Stanton rose again, knowing that the majority of the audience was now with him. He had not been disturbed by the unexpected interruption. And without referring to it, he now went on as if nothing had happened. The crowd enjoyed his calm, unruffled dignity, the absence of any resentment, the apparent calmness of his position which refused to be angered, excited, or ruffled by criticism.

"As I was saying, Christian Socialism stands for a new patriotism in the matter of a better, more sensible observance of our great national celebrations. It would not be possible, I suppose, to estimate the amount of money spent every Fourth of July in gunpowder in making a noise, in dissipations which have no connection whatever with the day or its meaning. I would like to propose to the people of this country, that next Fourth of July, instead of buying powder and burning fireworks to celebrate the day, we take that same amount of money, and in each town, village, city, or rural community, place some institution or object that will be a lasting memorial to good citizenship. In one city of 40,000 people last Fourth, just after a great and unprecedented flood had apparently drained the resources of the people in caring for those who had lost everything, over $10,000 were expended on fireworks, which gave a momentary pleasure to those who saw them, but which relieved no actual human distress, and ministered to no actual human need. That $10,000 put into a statue of Lincoln; put into pictures for the public schools; put into a permanent memorial building dedicated to the uses of good citizenship, would be a thousand times more sensible and patriotic than the use actually made of it. I appeal to the patriotism of this country to spend at least one Fourth of July in the way I have suggested. Have we not had racket and noise enough all these years? Will it hurt our boys to have them give their fireworks' money one year, at least, if they never do it again, to buy something that will last, something that they can be proud of as they look at it in their town that they helped to build? Are our children so destitute of any real love of country that we can teach them, as many of us do, to give their pennies to the Church and Sunday School and for missions, but cannot expect them to do anything, as children, for the real things represented by the Flag? Or are the parents of America afraid to ask their boys to enter into this kind of a celebration of the Fourth, as if they could not be taught real patriotism? I know of some sturdy Christian families that have already begun to revolt at the barbarous travesty on patriotism that our present Fourth of July stands for, and who have begun to teach their children the higher and better uses of the day. The children respond to that teaching, also, as children always will when the right motive is used. Christian fathers and mothers can expect to do great service to the country of the future. In any case, whether you believe with me or not on this point—and I do not expect the manufacturers of gunpowder or fireworks to rise and applaud—in any case it would not hurt this Republic, next Independence Day, to spend its money for some lasting, patriotic memorial, built by the school children of America, in the name of those great ideals which made our independence a historical fact in the eyes of the nations of the world.

"I PROTEST AGAINST THIS ADDRESS—THE AMERICAN PEOPLE OUGHT NOT TO LISTEN TO IT"

"7. Christian Socialism also embodies in its practical programme, a belief in the necessity for doing everything that can be done to annihilate the liquor business in all its forms.

"Very few Socialists advocate any restriction of the liquor business. Most of them say if Socialism were once established, it would not be profitable to engage in the liquor trade. Christian Socialism says with emphatic assertion, that one of its practical measures to be put in operation to-day, without waiting for anything else to happen, is some action political, religious, educational or economic, which looks to the removal of one of the greatest causes of human greed, misery, crime and poverty. It is now a well-established fact beyond the region of debate, that the saloon and all it represents, is a curse to humanity. Its removal would help tremendously in the effort to relieve human distress. Christian Socialism would not restrict or confine its efforts toward this removal to any one method or process. Whatever is effective that leads to the final annihilation of the institution, is a part of the programme of Christian Socialism. It is conceded that men drink because they are poor, but it is asserted, even more strongly, that men are poor because they drink. Among the causes of human misery—which any scheme of Socialism attempts to remove—are a man's temptations and surroundings. The saloon has had thousands of years trial. Civilization brands it to-day as a home destroyer, a crime breeder, a municipal corrupter, the friend and companion of thieves, prostitutes, and evil citizens. It has not one redeeming quality. Even its apparent charities are traps of the devil, to lure its victims and despoil them of their savings. The removal of the saloon under any system of economics, under any kind of social order, even the present social one, would result in untold blessing to every man, woman and child. Christian Socialism regards the liquor business as a sin and a crime combined. It is a sin against God to make a living by selling an article that robs men of health, reason, morals and money. It is a crime against the State to engage in a business, which the common verdict of civilization declares to be destructive to every other business, and the largest factor in filling jails, almshouses and asylums. The Christian Socialist cannot ignore the factor of the liquor business as a most serious economic factor. Every cent of the round billion spent every year in the United States on intoxicating drink, is worse than thrown away. It is an enormous leakage in the factor of savings, and it is the distinct duty of every lover of humanity, to use every effort in his power to remove this cause of human misery. Christian Socialism plainly declares as one of its unequivocal beliefs, the conviction that any real effort to benefit the social condition of the world, must count on the need of taking out of society an institution which is established to wreck and ruin every good thing that exists.

"8. A part of the programme of Christian Socialism, is its faith in the final leavening of the Church, the Sunday School, and the religious organizations of the Christian young people of the world. In other words, Christian Socialism believes in the real work which the true Church of Christ is doing in the world, and cannot conceive of a social order of men worth having or talking about, which shuts out the organization of the Church, the regular study of God's word, or the deeply enthusiastic religious activities of young life.

"The whole hope of a permanent social order that shall bless the world, rests on the true religious life of the race. Not on bigotry, not on fanaticism, not on sectarianism, not on man-made creeds, but on true religion, which Jesus taught, and, which is summed up in love to God and one's neighbor. The Church, with all its mistakes, and failures, has, nevertheless, contained a leaven of righteousness. It has stood for mighty essentials of human happiness. It is true, I hear someone say, you have left the church yourself, because she would not endure this teaching. No, I have not, my brother. I have only gone out of one local body because I believed I could work better than if I stayed in that special place. But I have not lost my faith in the Church of Christ in general, nor given up my love to her as embodying the real hope of society. I am profoundly and unalterably convinced that men and women are being reared in the Church to-day, as in no other institution known to men, for the express task of righting human wrongs and establishing the Kingdom of God on earth. I regard the Sunday School as an institution so full of social influence, that no scheme of Socialism can ignore it, or regard it as having little significance. It represents immense possibilities. To sneer at a Sunday School is to acknowledge the fact of a huge ignorance of one of the largest social factors in civilization. The young people's religious organizations are of such meaning and possibilities that Christian Socialism declares it to be a part of its faith in the future, to count on these young enthusiasts as wonderful factors in any order of the future that is worth working for. Christian Socialism declares its firm belief in the great fundamentals of the Church. Its teachings through the centuries of the value and necessity of a Christian Sabbath, is one of the vital faiths of Christian Socialism."

A CREED IN TWO WORDS

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

IN the evangelical churches it has been the common idea that a first class "conversion" must be such a revolutionary upheaval of soul as the conversion of the Apostle Paul. The colored man we have before quoted, who was closely questioned as to why he was not a Christian, and at last admitted, "I dreads de process," expressed what many felt in the first half of the nineteenth century, when the Pauline travail of soul was most insisted on. And even now, those who have had an easy spiritual birth are wont to doubt its genuineness. But this lesson reminds us that all but one of the twelve true apostles began their Christian life by a quiet obedience to that invitation and command of Christ, which was all the creed they had to start with: "Follow me." They did not yet understand even the divinity of Christ, much less the Trinity, but they did see that this Christ was one they could safely follow, and following him as open-hearted disciples, by imitation and impartation, they were "led into all truth," and into "newness of life," "as the dawning light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." We shall see in the story why they did not begin like Paul, with a mental revolution.

1. "Follow Me." It was only yesterday that the committee from Jerusalem, composed of priests and Levites, had come to investigate the preacher John, who was drawing such great crowds at the fords of the Jordan. They had returned to Jerusalem mystified, because of the hardness of their hearts by John's straightforward answer to their question, "Who art thou?"

On this, the following day, Jesus himself comes upon the scene, after having been forty days in the wilderness, since his baptism by John. John sees him afar off, and says to those who are near: "Behold the Lamb of God." Two of John's disciples are standing so close to him that they hear what he says; indeed, this remark may have been addressed to them. They have become greatly interested in Jesus through the preaching of John. They see that Jesus is not intending to stop, but only passing by, and they quickly determine to follow him.

Jesus feels that he is being followed. He turns about and asks, "What seek ye?" Andrew and John, for the two men are so named, reply: "Great Teacher, where dwellest thou?" Jesus, reading aright their thoughts, that they wanted to hear the truth from his lips, replies: "Come and see." They no longer walk behind him, but at his side. Andrew and John were so willing to follow Jesus wherever he should lead them, because their teacher, John the Baptist, had prepared the way for Christ in their hearts. Have not our hearts been thus prepared by faithful parents and teachers? You who have been brought up under the influence of Christian parents who have long known the way to be saved, who have been familiar for years with the teachings of the Sunday School and the pulpit, ought to wait for nothing more than Christ's invitation, and the whispers of the Spirit.

It is not by great or little emotion or conviction at the beginning, that your Christian life is to be measured. If a flash of light and joy fixes the date of your conversion at a certain day, or month, or hour, it is well; but it is more important still to be able to say at the present moment: "My heart is fixed on thee, my God." Saul was taught to hate Christ, so that when he heard the voice of Jesus from the sky at Damascus, he was startled and surprised, and it took three years in Arabia to readjust his mistaught soul to the new truth. That is why his conversion was so different from the other apostles.

After "Come and see," Jesus says "Follow me." And this gives us the secret of growth in Christian life, and success in Christian work—following the example and methods of Christ.

A boy in a printing-office was given a list of Scripture questions and answers to set up in print. While at work he asked the foreman if he should "follow the copy"; that is, set up the type just as it was written. "Certainly," said the foreman. "Why not?" The boy replied, "Because this copy is not like the Bible." "How do you know that?" "Why, I learned some of those verses in Sunday School, and I know that two of them are not like the Bible." "Well, then, do not 'follow copy,' but set them up as they are in the Bible." The boy took the Bible, and made it his copy, guide and pattern. The words of God fell into good ground when he learned those verses in school and did not forget them. You can do the same, and be sure you always "follow copy."

The footsteps of my blessed Saviour,
Mine shall be, mine shall be;
Like his, my words, my whole behavior,
All shall see, all shall see;
My heart be like the Saviour's mind,
My words, like his, be ever kind;
Till in my soul I nothing find,
Unlike thee, unlike thee. W. F. C.

2. Bring another. It is four o'clock in the afternoon, and Andrew and John have been with Jesus since ten o'clock in the morning. They say to him: "Great Teacher, your words are too good for us to hear alone, we would go and fetch our brothers that they may hear also." With all haste they speed away, leaving Jesus alone for rest and prayer.

Andrew is the first to return, bringing with him his brother Peter. At once Jesus recognizes in him the force of character which will make him a leader among men, and changes his name to Cephas, meaning a rock, as a prophecy of the rock-firm God trust which shall be developed in him.

"LOOKING UPON JESUS AS HE WALKED, HE SAITH BEHOLD THE LAMB OF GOD"

The morning dawns, and the four men with Jesus go forth into Galilee with evident intent to add to their number. They find Philip, one of their neighbors. Jesus sees something good in him, and says "Follow me." Philip is all the more ready to obey, seeing his friends Andrew and Peter in the company, and, not unlikely, he had himself listened to the preaching of John the Baptist concerning Jesus. They resume their journey, but have not gone far before a man is discovered sitting under a fig-tree by the roadside. He is reading a copy of the Scriptures. He is a friend of Philip, who says to him: "We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph." Nathaniel replies: "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Philip challenges him: "Come and see." Jesus sees him coming, and reads his heart like an open book: "Behold an Israelite in whom is no guile." What a testimony to come from the Lord Jesus! It reminds us of David's prayer: "Teach me, O God and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." Nathaniel in surprise asks: "Whence knowest thou me?" Jesus answers: "Before Philip called thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree." Nathaniel is convinced at once of what Philip had told him, and exclaims: "Great Teacher, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel."

Jesus now has six followers—six learners in his school. Three of these had brought three others. If this same ratio of increase had been kept up from then until now, there would not be one out of Christ in the world. Have you neglected to bring one—perhaps a brother?

A priest, who had presided over a Hindu temple for forty years, picked up a single leaf containing a portion of John's Gospel. He read it in private. It created in him a longing desire for something more. He procured a New Testament and read it through. From the reading of that book his mind was so convinced of the truthfulness thereof, that he said to himself: "I will be a follower of Jesus." He next read it to his wife and children, who resolved that they, too, would "follow Jesus." Then he began to gather his townspeople under a tree in the bazaar and read portions to them. The Holy Spirit made it clear to their understandings. The influential men of the town believed; their images were discarded; and a missionary coming to the place not long after, found them already interested and longing for a deeper knowledge of the truth.

Another case in point is a carpenter, converted by reading John's Gospel, put the little book into a frame instead of the Madonna, from which he could take it down and read it to his visitors.

3. "Thou art the Son of God." Let us take Nathaniel's words upon our lips. In reply to an inquiry as to his belief concerning the nature of Christ, Mr. Gladstone wrote: "All I write, and all I think, and all I hope, is based upon the divinity of our Lord, the one central hope of our poor wayward race."

Two gentlemen were discussing the divinity of Christ, when one of them affirmed, that, if it were so, it should have been more explicitly stated in the Bible. The other said; "How would you express it to make it indubitable?" He replied: "I would say that Jesus Christ is the true God." The other answered: "You are happy in the choice of your words, and they are the very words of inspiration. St. John, speaking of Christ, says; 'This is the true God and eternal life.'"

The admission of sceptics in regard to Christ are inconsistent with anything less than his divinity. Spinoza, who flouted his divineness, was still willing to call him "the temple of God." Rousseau referred to him as "a man of colossal dimensions, of wonderful sweetness and purity of life." Goethe went so far as to say that "Jesus was as divine as even the divine appeared on this earth." Channing, the Unitarian, said: "He was a character wholly removed from human comprehension. I know not what can be added to heighten the reverence and love due him." Theodore Parker said: "His was the mightiest heart that ever beat in a human breast." John Stuart Mill spoke of Jesus as "a unique figure, a man charged to lead mankind to truth and virtue." Richter said: "Jesus was the purest among the mighty, and the mightiest among the pure, who with his pierced hand has razed empires from their foundations, turned the stream of history from its old channel, and still continues to rule and guide the ages." Strauss said: "He was the highest model of religion within the reach of human thought." Renan said: "We believe him to be in the front rank of the great family of the sons of God. He was an incomparable man, greater than any of the past, and, probably, than any to come. Whatever the surprises of the future may be, Jesus of Nazareth will never be surpassed."

Never have such things been said of any mere man. In any case, one of whom such things can be said, is the safest teacher we can follow. In the words of Richard Watson Gilder:

If Jesus Christ is a man,
And only a man, I say
That of all mankind I cleave to him,
And to him will I cleave alway.
If Jesus Christ is a God,
And the only God, I swear
I will follow him through heaven and hell
The earth, the sea, the air.

A Big $2.00 Worth

I am highly pleased with the premium—the Calendar and the book Good Manners. I marvel that you can give so much for two dollars. (Rev.) Benjamin Franklin.

Our Girls and Overwork

I READ a pitiful story the other day of the death of a young girl from overwork. She was talented and ambitious, and at school she studied beyond her strength. The doctors warned her parents that she had a weakness of the heart, and must be shielded from too much labor or strain. So she was obliged to leave school, and was compelled to give up her desire for a college course. After a rest, she was better, and not wishing to stay at home, learned stenography and typewriting and took an office position which she filled efficiently. But the day's work did not satisfy her, and she studied unremittingly in the evenings, until, suddenly one day, the poor heart gave out, and after a few hours of pain and failing breath, she passed away.

This is an extreme case. The girl in question had a brave and eager spirit encased in a fragile body. But girls write me every day, and burden their letters with their desire to improve, to get on, to advance in knowledge and learn more of books, or of some handicraft that they can learn, unless they study after hours of work are over.

Our evening schools are crowded with young women who spend their sessions in persevering study after the day is done, and the Settlements and Working Girls' Clubs, and the Young Women's Christian Associations, and Girls' Friendly Societies, all show groups of earnest girls trying with their whole souls to make up what childhood failed to give them.

This is praiseworthy. The greater a young girl's intelligence, and the more disciplined her powers, the higher salary will she command in business, and the more interesting will she prove as a member of the community. And a girl who is in business all day, naturally wishes to spend her evenings in something different. She may seek diversion socially, and may be much more exhausted by late hours in pursuit of amusement, than by a couple of hours spent in study. The point is this: she should not overwork.

Girls, you and I have a certain amount of physical capital. We may overdraw this, and then we may soon find ourselves bankrupt in health. To use up our reserves, as we do when we indulge in late hours, when we are constantly tired, and constantly nervous and irritable, is to do a foolish thing. Nature will exact payment in full if we disobey any of her orders. Her fines come in the shape of headaches, of indigestion, of nervousness, and sometimes of heart failure.

"I always work until I drop," I have heard a girl say with pride. Now, to work until one drops is a thing to be ashamed of, to blush for, not a praiseworthy thing by any means. A much better rule is to stop before you are ready to drop. In the end, the person who works steadily and well, but who does not work beyond her strength, is the one whose work stands the test of time, and proves acceptable in the market.

The moment you feel that you are going to pieces, that you want to fly, or to fidget, or scream, or do something besides sit still, and, as the photographer bids you, look pleasant, you are probably suffering from overwork. What is the remedy? Is there one? To be sure there is. Get more sleep.

"But I can't go to bed at eight o'clock," pleads a girl who knows that at eight her head feels heavy, and her back aches. Well, eight may be too early, but what is there to be said against nine? Three hours of sleep before midnight would make many a tired girl over, keep her skin fresh, and her color bright, and immensely add to her good looks. Every normal girl wants to be beautiful, and ought to want this, for beauty is woman's birthright. But beauty fades when one is chronically weary, and under the strain of excessive toil.

"I am employed," writes one girl, "as bookkeeper in a wholesale woolen house. My position is responsible, and entails a great deal of labor. I would like to give it up, and undertake something else; but to do so must spend all my evenings in study. Will you recommend something that I can do?"

Flatly, my dear, I can not. You ought to spend your evenings in agreeable chat with your friends; go to the Christian Endeavor meeting one night, to a little neighborhood party another; but, as a rule, stay at home. You are bound to give your employers full value for your wages. To do this, you must be at your desk, fresh and unworn in body and mind, in the morning. You need recreation in the evening, not toil.

And don't if you can help it, fancy that because your present work is irksome, you would find other work less so. Work is exhausting although we may love it, and it matters very much less what we do, than how we do it. A teacher would prefer being a trained nurse; a stenographer, an artist; a dressmaker, a saleswoman, yet everyone is in a worthy occupation, calling for brains and ability. Work, dear girl, while you work. Play while you play. Never dawdle. Never shirk. But on the other hand, do not overwork, if you wish to live, and be useful, and happy.

As I have said before, I will reply to any young girl who writes to me, if she will enclose a self-addressed envelope, stamped. If I can help you in any problem, I shall be very glad. At all events, I can sympathize and understand, for I know and love girls.

GRANDMOTHER'S LIKENESS

A little edition de luxe, dear, of grandmother, stately and old;
But the beautiful copy, you see here, has a binding all shining with gold.

This child in the cap and the glasses, has eyes that are blue as the sky;
No cloud o'er her merriment passes, no trouble has caused her a sigh.

She is grave as she sits, for a dimple is trying to creep to her cheek;
And her dignity's perfectly simple; she'd laugh if she ventured to speak.

Was grandmother ever, I wonder, a wee winsome maiden like this;
So demure and so witching a mischief, you just haste to give her a kiss.

How to Organize a Club

HOW shall we organize our new club, or our literary society, is a question that puzzles women unused to the formation of friends into groups for a concerted work or united purpose?

First, canvass the town, or the circle of friends you think would like to join a club. Take their names. Then appoint an initial meeting at a convenient place. Send word to everybody concerned, briefly writing a postal card, naming the object and the date, specially naming day and hour. When the day arrives and all are assembled, let the meeting be called to order, and, with a temporary chairman, begin proceedings. An elaborate constitution and formal by-laws are generally superfluous, and as your little association is not to be legally incorporated, but is merely an assemblage of acquaintances, for social and friendly intercourse and mutual improvement and pleasure, not much machinery is wanted. It is usually difficult to find a name that suits every one, and perhaps as good a way out of this embarrassment as can be thought of, is to call the club after the village, as "The Brierdale Woman's Club," or after the day of meeting, as "The Thursday Morning Club." One literary club known to me, is "The Cresco," a name that contains a hint of growth; another, "The Gossips," which has the merit of candor.

A constitution is a document which sets sets forth what a society is and what it stands for. By-laws are the outcome of necessity, and may be made as they are found convenient.

A president, secretary and treasurer—the two latter offices often combined in one person—are the officers most desired. As the work develops, there will be different committees, with their chairmen.

A little money being useful, there may be a small sum for annual dues, and if a luncheon or tea is part of the programme when meetings are held, then each member will pay her share of this at the time.

A Book Club, in villages where there is no library, adds to the joy of life. Money enough must be contributed for the purchase of as many books as there are members. This is the initial proceeding. The payment of annual dues is devoted to the additional purchase of books. The books are lent to members for a week or a fortnight, and at the close of a year or more, there is a sale of the books on hand, the proceeds going to buy a new supply.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—Dora D. Calling hours in different places vary. As a rule, from three to six in the afternoon, are the hours preferred.

—Myrta. The expressions "His Girl" and "His Lady Friend," are hopelessly vulgar. Do not use them when alluding to a young man's financee.

—Eunice. The young man who called on you once or twice, was merely paying you a civil attention, and you had no reason to fancy him a lover.

—Gertrude. You are rather unkind in your criticism of a widower, who married a second time after a year of desolation in a lonely home. Remember, that the hours of grief are leaden-footed. Some hearts have room for a second love, or a third, in one course. We are not all alike.

—L. T. If I understand your question, I answer it affirmatively. Two young people, legally of age, who love each other have a right to marry. But it may be unwise to exercise the right if they are nearly related, or there is no certain income, or if their respective families are much opposed to the marriage.

A Thoroughly Pleased Subscriber

I wish to thank you for the beautiful premiums which I have just received from you. They far surpass my expectations. Mrs. Sangster's book, Good Manners, is an especially attractive premium, and I am sure I shall greatly enjoy reading it. The Dictionary is a marvel of conciseness. Everything needed is found there, and yet it is brief and right to the point. The Calendars which you send every year, are real works of art, and a continual delight to the eye throughout the year. I feel that words are inadequate to express my appreciation of these beautiful premiums. Most sincerely yours,

ASTRONOMY OF THE BIBLE

BY PROF. LEWIS SWIFT, F. R. A. S. C.

ARTICLE V.

THE FLIGHT OF THE STARS — JOB 38 : 31, 32, 33

COMBINED in these four questions which God asked Job, are involved as many mysteries but little understood by Bible readers, or by clergymen. Astronomy has taught us much as to their meaning; but it is necessary to add that some of them are debatable ones. They add another link in the chain of evidence that the Bible is of Divine authenticity.

Question I. "Can'st thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades?" (Revised Version: "Cluster.") The Pleiades are what every one calls the seven stars, but why thus called, when only six are visible to the naked eye, has never been satisfactorily explained. In my opinion, it is simply what is called folk-lore, and that seven were ever visible is extremely doubtful. This beautiful cluster is one of the most conspicuous objects in the sky—the bridal gem of our winter nights. The reader will no doubt be astonished when told that I have many times seen with my telescope 500 stars within the naked eye group. One astronomer photographed it, giving it an exposure of 17 1-2 hours, and counted on the negative plate, clearly defined, 2,326 stars, all inside the cluster; but they can have no connection with the six.

Many think the cluster is the centre round which our sun and its family are revolving once in 20,000,000 years. It is probably no more than a big guess; but, if true, it is not too big a one. The texts furnish some evidence of its truth. The idea awakens not a few tremendous thoughts.

When will our sun receive its next birthday? How many has he received in the past? How many will come in the future, "before the sun shall be darkened and the moon not give her light?" The Bible plainly asserts that there is a sweet influence between us and it, which throws a flood of probability on the truth of the suspicion, that the cluster is the centre around which we are revolving at the rate (in our age) of 12 1-2 miles a second.

Question II. "Or loose the bands of Orion?" The meaning of the question is somewhat obscure. Orion is the name of a constellation, represented as a human monster, with a belt around his waist, and on the belt are three conspicuous stars of the same magnitude, the same distance apart, and all in a line. If the passage has reference to the belt only, it should have been translated "band," as there is but one: but if it refers to the three stars, the translation is correct. As the passage needs no long discussion, being a debatable one, I will take up the next question, of more popular interest.

Question III. "Canst thou bring forth mazeroth in their season?" This is, in my opinion, the only one of the four questions God asked Job, about which no important ambiguity exists; yet many think the side I take is untenable. The sun once a year appears to revolve around the sky in a straight line, called the ecliptic. It is constantly in the middle of a belt 16 degrees in width, in which all the 8 planets and 22 moons have their orbital revolutions round the sun. This belt is called by astronomers the zodiac, but God, in Job, calls it the mazeroth. It is divided into 12 portions of 30° each, called signs and constellations. Some 2,000 or 3,000 years ago, when this scheme was devised, the signs and constellations occupied the same positions; but, owing to the precession of the equinoxes, the signs have retrograded from the constellations a whole sign. In some 24,000 years from now, the signs will have retrograded through the entire circle of the zodiac, when they will again occupy the one position they did at the beginning.

The sun, in his annual journey of twelve months, is one month in each sign, the character of the seasons depending upon which sign he is in. He is in Aries, Taurus, and Gemini in spring; in Cancer, Leo, and Virgo, in summer; in Scorpio, Libra, and Saggitarius in autumn; and Capricorn, Aquarius, and Pisces in winter. The Maker has arranged many circumstances of the highest efficiency to cause the seasons forever to comply with his law for the accurate succession of the seasons, that at some future time winter would not occur in July and August, and He asks Job if he could could do it—if he could make mazeroth and the seasons forever agree. Mazeroth is a plural noun, and can have no reference, as some suppose, to the morning or evening star. In II Kings 23:5, the word "planets," should have been translated "mazeroth," which accords with the opinion of many Hebrew and Biblical scholars.

Question IV. "Or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?" This question has elicited a vast amount of discussion as to what the guiding of Arcturus with his sons can mean. We have a bright star in our sky called Arcturus (Alpha Bootes), and one of the questions to be decided is: Is it identical with the Arcturus of the text? I contend that they are, while others affirm that they are not, and, apparently without any evidence, contend that the constellation Ursa Major (the Great Bear) is intended, a theory apparently against a positive Bible statement. This question, asked several thousand years ago, gave to the astronomical world an unknown fact of vast significance, that the stars are in motion; but this was not proved until the invention and improvement of the telescope. This motion of the stars is called their "proper motion," of which Arcturus in velocity is surpassed by but two stars, and is called the runaway star. Its motion is slight in arc (only seven seconds), but rapid in miles. Our sun, which is also a star, has a motion of twelve and a half miles a second. Where the countless millions of stars that adorn the belfry of the sky are going, is known only to Him "from out whose hand the centuries fall like grains of sand."

What does the expression, "with his sons," mean? The answer is as deeply in a halo of mystery as the other.

The sky is serried with several thousand double, triple, and multiple stars, so close together that the highest power of our largest telescopes are required to separate them. Most of them, no doubt, appear double, from one being almost exactly behind the other; but not all, for in many hundred cases, motion of revolution round each other has been detected. Such double stars are called binaries. The shortest period known is a spectroscopic binary, Mu Scorpii is thirty-five hours. Thinking that Arcturus might be a double, triple, or multiple star (hence called "his sons"), many attempts have been made to divide it, but without success.

My idea is that the Bible declares that Arcturus is rushing through the stars that compose his constellation, and that the stars in it are his sons. This idea harmonizes with the Bible account, and with what observational astronomy teaches.

These deductions afford not a few impressive lessons for thought, and show that modern science and ancient Scripture are never antagonistic. The telescope only detects motion in stars if moving at right angles to the line of sight, which the spectroscope will not do. On the other hand, the spectroscope detects motion in the direction of the line of sight, which the telescope cannot do. The spectroscope emphatically declares that Arcturus is moving toward the earth at the astonishing rate of fifty-five miles a second, going no one knows where. It is a bright star, and is undoubtedly much brighter now than when God asked the question of Job. Some of this motion may be due to our earth's motion toward Arcturus.

Where are we going? When I ask myself where are we going, there steals over me feelings of sadness as to how little we know about the countless millions of suns like our own, that bear us company in our endless flight. We are just passing through the threshold of heaven's wide-open door; but bye-and-bye, when we pass over the threshold of that house not made with hands, we may be able to see light, where all is now bathed in darkness unfathomable.

CAIN'S HERESY*

WHAT an awful world this would be, if the principle implied in Cain's question became the rule of life! It would abolish our lighthouses, close our hospitals, dissolve our charitable institutions, dehumanize society altogether. We recognize that to a certain extent we are our brothers' keepers. Miners imprisoned by an explosion in a pit, must be rescued at any cost of effort; people caught in a burning house must not be left to perish; a nation afflicted by famine must be fed. We are far from adequately fulfilling a brother's duty; but neither do we wholly repudiate our fraternal obligations. As the religion of Christ permeates a people, the extent of its responsibility for the welfare of its members is more clearly realized. It is perceived that common humanity requires a man who sees a brother going into danger, to warn him of his peril; or one who sees another in misfortune, to help him out of it. The man who asked Christ, "Who is my neighbor?" was directed to go out and be a neighbor to any one whom he saw needing help. Christ evidently wished his people to cultivate the neighborly spirit and to lend a hand to any one who might be in difficulty. The more intelligently the principle is applied, the further do we see our duties extend. To merely give money to a man in distress only partially fulfils the duty. We ought to find out why he is in distress, and remove as far as we are able the cause of his distress. In a word, we ought to treat every man as a brother and take a brotherly interest in his welfare.

Applying this principle of neighborliness to the gigantic curse of modern society, the propensity to intemperance, what is the duty incumbent upon us? If we are in truth our brother's keepers, what ought we to do for him in his difficulty? The most superficial acquaintance with the victims is sufficient to prove that the majority of them are unwilling victims. They despise themselves, they hate the bonds that the habit has wound around them, yet they cannot shake them off. They need help. How can that help be given them in the most effective way?

The question divides itself into two aims. The first is to help the victims, and the second is to prevent an increase in their number. The former is a difficult and almost hopeless task. A few may be saved, but so seductive and so powerful is the habit that superhuman power is needed to effectually accomplish it. The second aim, that of saving others from falling into the slough, is more hopeful, and if it is pursued intelligently and earnestly, the evil will eventually be eradicated from society.

In both efforts, the one essential course for the Christian is to set an example of abstinence. The victim who sees a man abstaining must draw the conclusion that abstinence is possible, and when he learns that it is practiced for his sake, his gratitude may impel him to follow the example. Children and young people who have not yet contracted the habit, witnessing the advantages of abstinence, may be led to avoid the beginning of the evil and so escape the struggle that costs the victims so much suffering. Thus both classes may be reached.

The self-denial involved in this most Christlike effort ought not to be too great for any Christian man. It has been frequently affirmed by physiologists that intoxicants do no man any good, and some have said that in the most minute quantities they are pernicious. But granting, for the sake of argument, that some slight advantage may be gained by their use, the fact that by giving them up a great good may be effected in society ought to determine the conduct of any Christian man. It is incumbent on him, as a Christian, that he deny himself for the benefit of others.

It has been frequently claimed that the moderate drinker does more harm than the drunkard, and in some senses the contention is true. The youth who sees a man able to use intoxicants in moderation, and sees that he is a Christian man, may conclude to follow his example, yet not having the same strength of character, may be led into drunkenness. If he saw every man who contracted the habit of drinking become a drunkard, he would be horrified at his danger and would abstain. It is the good man, the respectable man, who drinks without drinking to excess, who encourages the young man to toy with his danger. Thus, unconscious of the evil he is doing, he may be leading others, who have not his self-control, to contract the habit, and so be recruiting the ranks of the drunkards.

The Price of a Battleship for Peace

By LUCIA AMES MEAD

IT is not the malignity of the wicked so much as the muddled thinking of the well-meaning that causes the world's misery. To-day the government of the United States says it wants peace, and that the only way for it to keep peace is to spend annually of the people's taxes as much on armaments as is spent on all the public schools of the land from Maine to California. "I want peace," says Captain Hobson, "but the only way to preserve it is for us to have a fleet that can overawe the whole world;" and Secretary Morton tells us that we must have the most formidable navy on the globe.

Americans seem at present to be under the obsession of a new spirit of timidity and suspicion. What else accounts for the panic-fear that, during a period in which our population has increased only 50 per cent., and our wealth 100 per cent., has rushed our expenditure for the navy up over 700 per cent.? It is momentarily advancing at such accelerated speed that presently the cost of the navy alone will equal that of all our public schools.

We are proud of our schools. We call them the foundation-stone of our Republic, yet hardly one child in ten studies American history, or is graduated from a grammar school, and six millions of our people are illiterates. We need, as President Eliot says, ten times as much money for education as we are spending. But in this great rich country, while many children are getting only four months' schooling a year, while others are crowded with sixty children in a room, or are on half time, we are so under the dominance of this new terror, lest our neighbors may assault us, that we must take money sorely needed to turn our ignorant mob elements into decent, self-supporting citizens, and must put it into steel and dynamite. The only dangerous foes we have are the increasingly lawless elements within our borders. Thirty years ago, we were courageous, and though we had the Monroe doctrine to maintain, it did not keep us awake nights when our navy was a small one. We forced a peaceful settlement of the first Venezuela affair, when our battleships were few — quite enough to prevent war and maintain the Monroe Doctrine. Mankind may be roughly divided, so far as a foreign policy is concerned, into those who trust in the power of brute force and fear, and those who trust their national safety to reasonable, friendly conduct, and to the assumption that other Christian nations are neighbors, and not assassins. That is, some men try the futile wind's way, and some the successful sun's way, as in the fable. Yet this great, rich nation, protected by two oceans, with not a neighbor on its hemisphere that would dare attack it, with none of the dangers which threaten Europeans and make their armaments more pardonable, is to-day in furious frenzy shrieking for the "most formidable navy in the world," because it is apparently in abject terror of being attacked.

When the rulers of this country learn enough of cause and effect to tell their public servants that they are tired of paying taxes to arouse the fear and hatred of their neighbors, and that they want something worth while to show at the end of the year for their expenditure, then we shall begin to try a more modern and up-to-date way of getting justice, and ensurring national safety.

This way was presented by the Propaganda Committee, at the recent International Peace Congress. It was to raise from the world the price of one single battleship ($7,000,000) for peace propaganda. This was to be spent in placing on a prominent street in fourteen or fifteen of the world's great capitals an International Union, which, according to the needs of each locality, by means of stereopticon lectures, syndicate newspaper articles, etc., would carry on a great work of education among all classes—preachers, politicians, peasants, teachers, and business men. These Unions would all be affiliated and working in harmony with the Berne Peace Bureau, which is the headquarters of the movement.

That is to say, for the price of a piece of costly, intricate mechanism which, with the touch of a button, could be turned into old junk as quickly as was the Maine in Havana harbor; for the price of this ship, that costs as much to run in time of peace as it costs to run a college, and which will be of fighting service only thirteen or fourteen years, the following things could be done. We could erect a building, worth, with the land, $200,000, and endow its work with $300,000, upon Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, upon the Strand in London, upon the Rue de Rivoli in Paris, upon the Unter den Linden in Berlin, upon the Corso in Rome, and upon the principal street of Madrid, Vienna, St. Petersburg, Buda-Pesth, Cairo, Calcutta, Hong Kong, Tokio, and Buenos Ayres. We could, with such equipment, have a vast amount of unpaid service available under direction of expert organizers. Misinformation about international animus could be corrected, a press bureau maintained, and prizes offered for the best essays, novels, poems, inventions, that would help allay international misunderstanding, jealousy and suspicion. An antidote to a yellow press, poisoning the public with lies, would be the work of such widespread and disinterested agents. The cynical sneers, the flippant newspaper squibs, the editorial fallacies which crop out periodically would not be left to be answered by the few over-burdened and weary men, who now steal hours from their sleep and recreation, paying their own printing bills and postage, to do the blessed work of peace-makers. A corps of trained persons would nail each lie or would score each silly outburst of belligerency.

Would there not, think you, a new spirit, as from the four winds of heaven, begin to stir and arouse the torpid and despondent, and allay the fever from that "military bacillus," which, as Hon. Richard Olney truly says, "has entered the American people?" This phrase does not imply, as President Butler of Columbia University seems to think, that Mr. Olney believes our people love war, but it does mean that our nation is relying, as it never did before, upon military power, and that we are growing suspicious and arrogant. So long as the American voter assumes that men who have great technical knowledge are wise in statecraft also, and are to be implicitly followed, and therefore abdicates his prerogative of independent thought, he will continue to pay out his money for battleships that are becoming a menace and not a security of the world's peace. The words of a few earnest persons of insight are, alas, not likely to change quickly his muddled notions of what constitutes national safety. But, among the numerous givers to matters of second, or third, or tenth-rate importance, I prophesy there soon will arise some who will say, "Let us have done with putting our money into palliatives and poultices for the body politic. Now that the Permanent Tribunal is ready for every case, and a Stated International Advisory Congress is imminent, the world is getting organized, and war no longer is to be tolerated between sane nations, however long militia and police may still be needed in this world to compel men to come to court. Now that some practical scheme is at last ready and, if carried out, is bound to shape the history of the world and to set free the billions now swallowed up in a senseless armed peace, let us put our hands into our pockets and have the satisfaction of doing something more original and more far-reaching than building another hospital, or library, or university. Let us give the price of one battleship for peace, and see if it will not accomplish more than all the battleships launched in a generation."

Alcohol, the Common Foe

By REV. HERVEY WOOD, Field Secretary, National Temperance Society

ONE of the strange, inexplicable things that puzzles every student of the Word of God is this: that Christian men and women, with an open Bible in their hands, should tamper with strong drink. The good Book is full of warnings as to the effect of alcoholic liquors upon the body, mind, and soul of man. It is utterly impossible to use stronger language than the Holy Spirit has used concerning this evil thing.

Every well-informed person knows—for it has been stated again and again by men like the late Judge Davis of the city of New York—that, "ninety per cent. of the crimes committed against the person, and against society, are caused by strong drink." Men and women whose brains are aflame with alcohol commit the most heinous crimes. The open saloon is the rendezvous of criminals of every kind. There the gambler, the card sharper, the thug, the highway robber hide, and there the anarchist concocts his diabolical schemes against society and individuals. The saloon has been aptly named, "a breathing hole of perdition;" and yet, with all the facts of history before them, knowing full well the misery, suffering and sin wrought by the intoxicating cup, men will go into such places and drink the body and soul-destroying "liquid damnation," as Sir Wilfred Lawson designates strong drink.

Every intelligent person knows that alcohol is brain poison; that it has an affinity for the brain; and that the man whose brain is filled with alcohol, is very apt to "err in judgment," the world knows only too well. Bitter experience has taught mankind this hard fact. Why do all the railroad managers prohibit the use of strong drink by engineers and other employees of the roads? Read the history of railroads for the past fifty years. Look upon the holocausts that shed their lurid light along every road in our country, and you will know why. What business house of any standing will employ a man, if they know he drinks? Some of the brightest minds in commercial life, and in the railroad world, have been drowned in the maelstrom of drink. But these are not the only walks in life that have suffered from drink. Bankers, brokers, Congressmen, senators, lawyers, doctors, aye, even ministers of the Gospel, like the prophets of Isaiah's day, have been "swallowed up of wine." Some of the most brilliant minds this world has ever seen, have been drowned in the intoxicating cup.

On due consideration, I charge: 1. That the liquor traffic is the greatest hindrance to the progress of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ in our own land, and is obstructing and destroying the work of our missionaries in foreign lands. This is the universal testimony both at home and abroad. Ask the Rev. John G. Paton, D.D., the veteran missionary to the New Hebrides, as he pleads with America to stop the sale of liquors to his people, in a land where fifty years of consecrated missionary labor is being all undone by New England rum. Ask Bishop Thoburn of India. Ask the missionaries of the Congo and the dark Continent. Ask our missionaries to the Red Indians on our own frontier. With one voice, all will answer, "The accursed Liquor Traffic is our greatest foe."

2. The Liquor Traffic is at this moment seeking to destroy the American Christian Sabbath in every part of our country, by selling liquor in defiance of law, and in several States it is seeking the passage of laws legalizing the opening of Saloons on the Lord's Day. For several years past, at everyone of the Annual meetings of the National Liquor Dealers' Associations and Leagues, this has been the avowed purpose. To carry out this object they have raised vast sums of money.

3. The open saloon is the world's greatest death-trap, the rendezvous of criminals of all kinds, and the most fruitful source of crime, misery, insanity and pauperism. This charge is self-evident. Consult the records in every civilized country, of penal institutions, insane asylums, and alms houses, and poorhouses, and these will satisfy any inteligent person of the truth of this charge.

Further, the Liquor Traffic is detrimental to every legitimate and honest business. It is a menace to the traveling public, by sea or land, and ought, for the public safety, to be banished from every part of our country. Why do the railroad managers, the steamship companies and other public carriers insist that their employees shall let liquor alone? Why do the traveling public feel safer when they know that the man on the engine, and the conductor on the train, and the captain and officers on the bridge of the steamer are perfectly sober? The answer is not far to seek. Bitter experience in bygone days has taught the traveling public to demand that their lives shall not be endangered by a drunken man at the throttle or on the bridge,

The Liquor Traffic is the most deadly enemy of the home and the family. It is debauching wives, sisters, and daughters, turning husbands and fathers into inhuman monsters and fiends, sons into criminals and malefactors, and sending thousands into untimely graves. Does this charge need substantiation? Open the book of memory and read there the record of broken-hearted wives, or wrecked homes that you have known of personally. Read the daily newspapers and they will furnish all the evidence you can ask, of the truthfulness of this charge. One of the saddest facts is this, that there has been a very large increase of drunkenness among the women and girls of our country. This condition of things can be traced to several sources, viz: To the sale of liquor in so many grocery stores. To the department stores, many of which have gone into the liquor business. To the confectionery stores, some of which are serving whiskey in tea-cups and in ice cream. To patent medicines, some of which contain as high as seventy and ninety per cent. of alcohol. Through all of the above named channels, liquor is finding its way into our homes.

I charge further that the Liquor Traffic is corrupting our police and our legislators, and is seeking to control the municipal, state, and federal governments, so that instead of our government being "of, for, and by the people," it is fast becoming "of, for, and by the Liquor Traffic." This is a startling charge, but it is unfortunately too true. It is getting to be so common that our people are acquiescing in the condition of things as one that cannot be prevented. Every one of the 250,000 saloons in our land is a centre of political influence.

In 1903, an attempt was made to legalize the sale of liquor on Sundays in the saloons of New York, on the plea that, "out of 12,546 saloons in Greater New York, 8,600 were open, and liquor being sold" on Sunday. This plea furnished a startling revelation of how far the public conscience was being debauched by the lawless saloonists.

What are you doing to save the American Sabbath from becoming a day of debauchery and drunkenness, to protect our homes, our families, our churches, and our country from the attacks of this infamous traffic in strong drink, which degrades and ruins the bodies and souls of men?

More Outrages in Armenia

NEWS has been received of fresh outbreaks in Armenia, attended by loss of life. Before daylight one morning recently, a band of revolutionists entered the village of Nareg, about thirty miles southwest of Van. They demanded about 100 bushels of wheat, which the villagers were to carry to the top of the neighboring mountain on Sunday night. Sunday evening just before sunset, the village was surrounded by soldiers and zaptiehs, who opened fire on the revolutionists, who had been betrayed by a Kurd spy, named Abdul Kafur, a professed friend of the revolutionists. After sunset, the revolutionists started for the mountain. Two zaptiehs, one of them a brother of Abdul Kafur, had entrenched themselves in a hole near the road and fired at the revolutionists as they approached; in the fight that ensued, Abdul Hamid, brother of Abdul Kafur and a notoriously bad man, was killed, whereupon the soldiers and zaptiehs fled. The following morning, the government forces returned, and finding none but the oldest men and a few boys and children in the village, they set fire to the monastery. Then the soldiers withdrew and the zaptiehs handed the village and the Armenians generally over to the Kurds, headed by Abdul Kafur, with permission to rob, murder and burn as they pleased. Two old men, aged 110 and seventy-five, were murdered and stripped in the village The village was completely pillaged and each house set on fire. All Armenians found on the road or in the fields and some in neighboring villages were robbed and murdered, some being horribly tortured. One man named Nercess Bozigian, was thrown down, his clothing set on fire and then dry grass thrown upon him, and either before or after this, probably before, he was slashed and cut with knives, an attempt being made to write Turkish on his body with a sharp knife. Another man had ten stab wounds, another four bullet wounds. One man's head was battered to a pulp. The bodies of twenty men and boys were found. Many cattle were burned to death. No woman was killed, but several were wounded. Abdul Kafur took a boy child from its mother's arms and rolled its head under his foot until the skull was fractured. The frantic mother snatched the child away and ran off with it. It is still living but there is little hope of its recovery.

The Kaimakam, Lutvy Bey, made no effort to save the villages and purposely kept away from the scene of ravage. The Vali promises punishment of the guilty parties and return of the stolen property, and has ordered distribution of grain to the people who are starving.

It is rumored that the Kaimakam and Captain Khalil, Effendi of the zaptiehs, have been removed.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. L. W. K., Chicopee Falls, Mass. "I thank God that I have the blessed privilege of acknowledging his great kindness in answering many prayers for me. The Lord is an ever present help in time of need. I am still in trouble, but I think he will help me out if it be his will to do so."

L. D., Boston, Mass. "I wish to add my testimony of an answered prayer, one which has been answered in a very direct manner, and would add that I was led to make the prayer after reading 'Answered Prayers.'"

Carrie C. G., N. Y. "Some time ago I promised God, when I was in great trouble, that if he would show me how to get through it, I would acknowledge it. My prayer was answered in a most wonderful manner, and I wish to keep the promise made."

Ruth A. A., New Jersey. "One year ago I asked your prayers for me. I was in great difficulty, and the future looked very dark, both for myself and brother. I believe God heard and answered our prayers, and my heart is full of thankfulness to him."

M. R. C., Iowa. "I want to acknowledge the goodness of God in answering my prayers. Ever since childhood I have taken all my troubles to him in prayer, and how often he has answered my prayers distinctly."

J. B., New York. "I promised God about three years ago, that if my sister, who was in poor health, was spared to us for a while at least, that I would acknowledge it. He has answered my prayer, and I wish to keep my promise."

Miss J. and Miss P., Philadelphia. "We can testify to many answers to prayer, having gone out to follow our Lord together for twenty-two years. We are trusting him now in a sore trial, for deliverance. Pray for us."

Mrs. J. H. C., Mich. "When my soul was greatly burdened, I prayed to Jesus for help, and he heard and answered me. Doubting one, he will help you, too, if you come to him with a sincere heart, confessing your sins and if you have been a great sinner, it will afford Jesus an opportunity of proving to you that he is a greater Saviour."

Reader, New York. "I desire to praise God in answer to prayer. Praise his holy name. I know he will always answer in his own way."

E. A. M., Ohio. "Three petitions I offered unto the Lord. One has been answered more fully than we could hope or think. Truly our Father is infinite in power and love. The other two prayers I am sure will be answered in his own good time."

Rev. C. A. Lawrence, Pastor M. E. Church, Depew, N. Y. "Might I ask the prayers of all Christian people for our church, and for myself, in this extremely difficult field?"

Anna W., Alabama. "I wish to publicly acknowledge that God has heard and answered my prayers many times."

E. W., Iowa. "I want to acknowledge God's great goodness to me in answering my prayer so many times. Reading the 'Answered Prayer' column has helped me so much, and I have asked and received. Praise the blessed Master! I hope and trust in God; he will fully deliver me."

A Young Girl, Pennsylvania. "I desire to manifest my thankfulness to God for the many prayers he has answered for me, and am confident he always will if asked the right way. For the benefit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD members please publish it in the 'Answered Prayer' column."

H. A., Missouri. "I prayed if God would spare my wife, who was very sick, I would tell of it in 'Answered Prayers.' He has done so, and as I am a wicked man, I know God does answer prayer, even from those who don't often pray."

C. S., Tenn. "The testimonies that appear from time to time in your columns concerning God's goodness in answering prayers, are a great comfort to me. Many times in the past God has opened his ears to my supplication, and sent a gracious answer to my petitions. We can trust him fully for every needed blessing."

A Constant Reader. "I promised the Lord if he would bring my dear child out of a sore trouble in safety and restore her to health and strength, I would acknowledge it to the world. My prayers have been heard in her behalf she has been restored to health and strength. I hope my experience may be some encouragement for others to pray."

Answered prayers have also been received from the following: Mrs. J. C., Bonham, Tex.; Mrs. G. B. J., Christiansburg, Va.; Lizzie S., Franklin, Pa.; C. M. Giddings, Jackson, Mich., and others.

A Princely Premium

The beautiful premium, Good Manners, was duly received, and was greatly appreciated. Just as I had removed the wrappers and was examining the book, an uncle and cousin unexpectedly drove up for the day, who were much interested both in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the premium. How can you do such wonderful things? You must be veritable wizards to be able to publish such a good paper and give away such princely premiums, too. My father is lost, if for any reason THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does not arrive upon its usual day. For years we have been recipients of your liberality, and once again are indebted to your generosity. Heartily thanking you for the favor received, and with best wishes for the continued success of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I am,

HABIT'S CHAIN

Certain Habits Unconsciously Formed and Hard to Break.

An ingenious philosopher estimates that the amount of will power necessary to break a life-long habit would, if it could be transformed, lift a weight of many tons.

It sometimes requires a higher degree of heroism to break the chains of a pernicious habit than to lead a forlorn hope in a bloody battle. A lady writes from an Indiana town:

"From my earliest childhood I was a lover of coffee. Before I was out of my teens I was a miserable dyspeptic, suffering terribly at times with my stomach.

"I was convinced that it was coffee that was causing the trouble and yet I could not deny myself a cup for breakfast. At the age of 36 I was in very poor health, indeed. My sister told me I was in danger of becoming a coffee drunkard.

"But I never could give up drinking coffee for breakfast although it kept me constantly ill, until I tried Postum. I learned to make it properly according to directions, and now we can hardly do without Postum for breakfast, and care nothing at all for coffee.

"I am no longer troubled with dyspepsia, do not have spells of suffering with my stomach that used to trouble me so when I drank coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Triumphs of Missions*

ONE of the most effective answers to hostile critics who sneer at the Church as stationary, not to say stagnant, is a work just issued by the Funk & Wagnalls Company, of New York and London. Twelve years ago that firm issued an Encyclopedia of Missions, which was thoroughly up to date, giving all particulars and statistics of missions in every country in the world. It was comprehensive, accurate and concise. It was a handbook of inestimable value, not only to the missionary, but to every Christian interested in mission work. A new edition has lately been called for and it was proposed to revise the work. Critics were invited to express their opinions of its faults, which should be corrected in the new edition. The answers were almost unanimous, that its chief and almost sole fault was its antiquity. In the past twelve years so much had been accomplished; so much that was entirely new had been originated; so many movements bearing on the work of foreign missions had been inaugurated, that the Encyclopedia, though up-to-date twelve years ago, was as antiquated as a scientific work half a century old; so rapidly had the Church moved on in its aggressive lines.

Accordingly a new work was projected, to record the new spheres entered and the advance in the fields already described. The work was laborious, for societies in America had to be consulted, the latest statistics obtained; and details of new developments must be classified and described. Condensation also was required, for the first edition, issued in two large volumes of about 670 pages each, had proved too bulky, and the price of $12, low as that was for a work involving so much labor, had been too high for many who longed for it, but whose means were limited. The result is the work just published.

No little skill in condensation has been displayed by the editors, Rev. Henry Otis Dwight, LL.D., Rev. H. Allen Tupper, Jr., D.D., and Rev. Edwin Munsell Bliss, D.D., in reducing the length of some of the articles so as to give the essential facts, while recording recent developments. This has been so thorough, that while one volume of 850 pages covers the whole field, no important item of information has been omitted. New articles dealing with the Student Volunteer Movement, the College Young Men's Christian Association and the development of the sociological work of Missionary Societies, along medical and industrial lines, have been inserted. The history of every missionary society, its post-office address, and the progress of its work, is a valuable and interesting feature of the book. The description of every missionary field, its statistics, climate, native religion, makes the Encyclopedia a gazetteer of the world from the missionary standpoint. In Central Africa, Western and Northern China, Mongolia, Korea, Northern Burma and South America, important work has been done, which is fully described. In Japan, in the Laos country, and among the low castes of India, missionary work has taken new forms of a deeply interesting character, all of which is fully described. The one sad feature of the book is the additions that have been made to the obituary list, some of them of eminent workers whose labors have immortalized their names.

One of the most astonishing facts brought out by the Encyclopedia, is the number of languages in which the Bible or portions of it have been published. In one of the appendices a complete list of these, numbering upwards of 400, is given. With this, we are glad to see, is a list of the honored names of missionaries who have made the translations. They are men who have rendered a service of incalculable value to the people among whom they labored, and their names ought never to be forgotten. Another appendix contains a complete list of the missionary societies, with the number of missionaries it employs, the number of native workers, the number of regular preaching stations, its schools and colleges, hospitals, dispensaries, and finally, the number of professing Christians under its care.

The publishers have laid the whole Christian world under obligation by producing so comprehensive a work, the cost of which must have been enormous. It covers every phase and department of missionary labor, and affords to the student full and complete information on every sphere of labor. To preachers, to members of young people's societies, it is of special value, as it shows in available form the status in any heathen land of the missionary work.

What Jesus is Doing, by J. F. Shorey, convert and helper of Moody & Sankey. In his dedication, the author calls his book, "First aid to the wounded in the fight with King Alcohol." Published by Alfred Holness, 13-14 Paternoster Row, London, E. C.

Cogitations of a Crank. Under this rather peculiar title is published the poems of Sep. Winner. An interesting biographical sketch precedes the poems, which include the emotional, pastoral, lyrical, cynical, satirical, incidental, ironical and sentimental emanations from the pen of Mr. Winner. Published by A. T. Drexel Biddle, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Short History of Germany. by Mrs. H. C. Hawtry, with additional chapters by Amanda M. Flattery. The author says that her aim in this little book (300 pages) is to give but a mere outline of the history, and to simply give one marked characteristic of each King or Emperor's reign, so as to fix it in the memory, and to show how Prussia came to hold its present position of importance among the continental powers of Europe. Published by Longmans, Green & Co., 91-93 Fifth Ave., New York. Price

Four Generations

WE reproduce an interesting photograph, which shows four generations of a family in Brewster, Kans. At the time this photograph was taken, the great-grandmother, Mary Heath, was aged sixty-six years; the grandmother, Martha Trotter

Wright, was aged forty-six; the mother, Celie Emel, was aged twenty-six, and the great-grandchild, Atta Emel, was six years. Sixty years and two generations divide the eldest of the group from the youngest; but there exists between the aged and the youthful face a striking resemblance. It must seem to Mrs. Heath, as though in the different generations she were living again the different stages of her own life.

The Race-Track Gambling Evil

E. G. Sisson, in "The World To-Day"

ANY morning in Chicago or New York one may see girls of sixteen and seventeen, with their heads close together over a newspaper tabulation, trying to figure out "winners," during their street car or elevated-road ride to the factories and offices where they are employed. Listen to them, and you will hear the language of the track. They know the relative reputations of the jockeys, and can talk glibly of their riding weights and of their seats in the saddle. They know the horses, and their supposed likings for track, weight and distance. They are ready for handbook plucking.

Meet them on the way home, and you will hear them say sadly that "luck" had not been with them that day, and will see them tear up their tickets and throw them away. Only one thing is worse for these girls than losing, and that is winning. Losses may bring a tardy, dejected reform. Winnings lead to the frenzy of daily trips to the race-courses themselves; to the spurring of all wild emotions; to the plunge into the black, engulfing chasm where life is the least of the things lost.

Observation will show that boys take their first gambling lessons earlier than girls. If they have sucked the poison, they will be hardened gamblers when not half way through their teens; the idea of working for a living is lost as soon as the fever of chance is in their blood. In poolrooms, on race trains, at the tracks, the majority of "regulars" are young in years, though old in everything else. But though their schooling is sooner acquired than that of girls, it is begun at the same place, the handbook kindergarten, and the instructor is the same, the newspaper "dope sheet."

The apparent success of wealthy plungers is the illustration always advanced by those who wish to justify their own gambling practices. The truth is, that no plungers are lastingly successful. A man may make so much money away from the turf that the turf may not be able to devour it, but the chances are that when the craze has fastened itself to him, he will desert everything else and feed himself and his fortune to it.

And the nation—must it abide the sight of its own moral peril? Does the doctrine that human nature must not be forced to be too good demand a compromise? Are race-tracks essential to metropolitan life? Boston, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Milwaukee, Omaha and other cities have got along without them. With Chicago, New York and the cities which have them, however, the immediate issue is that of restriction of the gambling opportunity.

A Banker's Philosophy

AT the annual banquet of the Associated Bankers of the City of New York, held there recently, one of the most notable addresses of the occasion was that delivered by Mr. P. F. Murphy, on "The Pleasures of Toil and the Toil of Pleasure." Some of the epigrams uttered by the speaker are worth remembering. Among others were these:

"Wall Street is not the straight road to success, but a narrow, crooked street, with the river at one end and a graveyard at the other."

"The folly of one woman creates more noise than the discretion of a thousand."

"Many have a habit of thinking that what they want is what the Lord intended them to have."

"In financial affairs, the men who know do not tell, and the men who tell do not know."

"Poverty produces vigilance and economy; vigilance and economy bring honor and riches; honor and riches are apt to cause pride and luxury; pride and luxury easily glide into idleness and extravagance; idleness and extravagance again come back to poverty, and the revolution is complete."

"What we get from England in commerce, they get back from us in matrimony; we make heiresses here; they make peeresses of them there."

"In the useful parts of any profession, moderate abilities, even if balanced with a little dulness, are more serviceable to the possessor than brilliant qualities."

"We in America are so swift and so busy that we take our pleasures sadly, but we perform our duties gaily."

"In walking the streets, some of the merriest countenances are seen in carriages going to funerals."

"Wealth can be used for good or evil, depending on the temper of the possessor. Poverty will always be with us. Heaven allows such inequalities to exist, and man submits to them upon a general plan, that those who have more than enough should take care of those who want."

Called Higher

There passed away at her home in Haldimand Township, Ont., Can., recently, a lady whose history is indissolubly connected with the early educational work of the province and with matters of much historical interest—Miss Susan Greely—who had attained the great age of ninety-eight years and six months. She was a daughter of Mr. Aaron Greely, who was among the very first to settle in Haldimand Township. Here Miss Greely has resided continuously for eighty-three years. She received her education in her home, where her mother was her teacher, and it is said that at the age of twelve years she had read some four hundred books. She taught school for a number of years, but it is in connection with her Sunday School work that she is the most widely known. The story of Miss Greely's Sunday School has been told throughout Ontario. Before the township was divided into school sections, she taught in a Sunday School in a public schoolhouse near her own property. The division into sections necessitated changes in the location of school houses, and she pleaded in vain with the trustees to have the building left to be used for Sunday School and other meetings. Failing in this, she organized a Sunday School, which she continuously conducted up to last autumn, in her own house, thus having been in the work eighty years, a record, which, in all probability, has never been surpassed in any country.

An Aged Subscriber

I received your "Holiday Greeting" last evening. We have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in our home, and are very much in love with it. My mother, Mrs. E. M. Shaw, who lives with me, has been a subscriber to your paper for several years. She is now in her eighty-seventh year, and reads your paper every week with great interest. She renewed her subscription for another year, a few days ago. Your premiums are beautiful, and the paper full of interesting reading from the first page to the last. MRS. ELWOOD WEAVER.

Seeking Jesus

By MRS. M. BAXTER

THE testimony of John the Baptist, when he was urged to declare who he was, went to prove that his was a witness foretold in the prophecy of Isaiah, which every Jewish authority would hold to be authentic. John was popular, but when the world's great ones saw him to whom he bore witness, they were disappointed; this was not their ideal of the expected Messiah. The Lord himself testified of John: "He was a burning and a shining light, and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light" (John v. 35), Yes, for a season only! When Herod murdered John, none of the Jewish authorities protested, and it looked as though their callousness were reckoned by the Lord as being virtually implication in the murder of the Baptist.

Truly, the Lord came as a root out of a dry ground (Isa. 1: 2); for the people of Israel were spiritually like a parched land. Was it then to minister to such a people that he would choose disciples? Yes; for he would, by his sacrificial death, atone for all their sin, becoming a curse for them (Gal. 3: 13), and, moreover, he would send his Holy Spirit to enable them to understand, and to do the will of God. He knew that he would be rejected, and that like Ezekiel of old, he would speak to the house of Israel, which would not hearken unto him (Ezek. 3: 5-7), and yet he patiently pursued his mission, and died, not as a martyr for, but as a life-giver to, those who rejected him. He was the corn of wheat which, by dying, would bring forth much fruit (John 12: 24, 25). It was not only the Jewish people as a whole which must prove by their attitude towards him how unfit they were for the kingdom they were expecting to be brought in by their Messiah; how much they needed first a moral and spiritual change. His chosen disciples also must learn humbling lessons about themselves, and know the plague of their own own hearts before they could be fitted to be teachers of the way of Christ's salvation.

It was the next day after the great announcement, which was the culmination of the witness of John: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." "John stood, and two of his disciples, and looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith, Behold the Lamb of God! And the two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus." John's disciples were so only that they might become the disciples of Jesus. "The Baptism of Repentance" has no meaning unless it leads on to pardon. John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe on him which should come after him—that is, on Christ Jesus (Acts 19: 4). Our Lord is never unconscious of one who draws near to him. "Jesus turned and saw them following, and saith unto them, What seek ye?"

Oh, what different answers might be given by those who profess, and even seek to follow Jesus, if this question were put to them! Some would say "I seek happiness;" some, "I seek power over sin," Some, "the power to do good;" some—the very few—would say with Paul: "I seek to know thee, and the power of thy resurrection, and the fellowship of thy sufferings."

"They came and saw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day, for it was about the tenth hour" (near the end of the day). Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, was one of these two, and probably the earnest, energetic Peter was also one of John's disciples, and Andrew, after this interview with Jesus, "first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messiah (Hebrew), which is being interpreted (i. e., into the Greek) the Christ" (in English, the Anointed One). If we really love our nearest and dearest, our first testimony of Christ will be to them, but in such a way as to make them desire to know him also.

Nothing is of such import in any life as this great discovery. Miserable is the life which has not found Jesus. It is the instinct of one who has found the Lord, to seek, by some means or other, to lead others to him. It is true, some are unwise in the way they do it, and some do more harm than good, by asking direct questions, without being taught of the Spirit when and how to ask them.

If You Want Cash

For Your Farm, Home or Business,

I CAN GET IT

No Matter Where Your Property is Located or What it is Worth . . . .

IF I did not have the ability and facilities to sell your property, I certainly could not afford to pay for this advertisement. This "ad." (like all of my other "ads.") is practically sure to place on my list a number of new properties, and I am just as sure to sell these properties, and make enough money in commissions to pay for the cost of the "ad." and make a good profit besides. That is why I have the largest real estate business in the world to-day.

Why not put your property among the number that will be sold as a result of this "ad."?

I will not only be able to sell it—sometime—but will be able to sell it quickly. I am a specialist in quick sales. I have the most complete and up-to-date equipment in the world. I have branch offices throughout the country and a field force of 3,000 men to find buyers.

I do not handle any of the side lines usually carried by the ordinary real estate agent. I do not make any money through renting, conveyancing, mortgages, insurance, etc. I MUST SELL real estate—and lots of it, or go out of business. I can assure you I am not going out of business. On the contrary, I expect to find, at the close of the year 1905, that I have sold twice as many properties as I did in 1904, but it will first be necessary for me to "list" more properties. I want to list YOURS and SELL it. It doesn't matter whether you have a farm, a home without any land, or a business; it doesn't matter what it is worth or where it is located. If you will fill out the blank letter of inquiry below and mail it to me to-day, I will tell you how and why I can quickly convert your property into cash, and will give you my complete plan (free) and terms for handling it. The information I will give you will be of great value to you even if you should decide not to sell. You had better write to-day before you forget it.

If you want to buy any kind of a Farm, Home, or Business, in any part of the country, tell me your requirements. I will guarantee to fill them promptly and satisfactorily.

ROYAL

Absolutely Pure

Baking Powder

The increased use of Royal Baking Powder risen food will somewhat alleviate the inconvenience which housekeepers suffer from the prevailing high prices of many articles of food.

In yeast made bread a large percentage of flour is destroyed to produce the gas which leavens it. In home-made Royal Baking Powder bread all this is saved.

A large part of a loaf of bread is water. When you buy bread you pay for water at the price of flour. In cake sometimes a quarter of the weight is water.

Royal Baking Powder will save a third of the eggs in a cake, and make the cake equally fine and more healthful. Besides, there is a satisfaction in serving cake of your own making.

Use more cake, hot biscuit, bread, rolls and pastry, and make them at home. You will be surprised in the saving, and at the superiority of your foods.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

M. D. B., Medina, O. Who wrote the books of Kings and Chronicles?

The author is entirely unknown. There probably existed an official record, as with other kingdoms. This was doubtless edited by some scribe, and made a continuous story with comments while the kingdom continued. Afterwards, during the exile in Babylon, it was again examined and revised. The expression, "to this day," frequently used, show that a later hand than that of the original author had worked over the books. The Chronicles are the history from the priestly standpoint. The Temple and its services are the main features of the books. You can imagine how different would be the history of the United States as written by a statesman and as written by a clergyman. They might not contradict one another, but the emphasis on events would be different as they were viewed from different standpoints.

Reader, Sarahsville, O. 1. Will you please tell me the date of Henry Ward Beecher's birth, giving the day of month, month and year? 2. Also the name of some of his best works and where I could get them?

1. Born in Litchfield, Conn., June 24, 1813. 2. His writings, with the exception of The Life of Christ, were chiefly sermonic and editorial. See his Life, published by Funk & Wagnalls, New York.

M. L. E., Morganton, N. C. What is the meaning of the power to bind and loose in Matt. 18: 18?

The power of binding and loosing was familiar to the Jews. When the question arose as to what things were lawful, such, for instance, as what might or might not be done on the Sabbath, the scribes settled the question by an authoritative dictum. This power, which it would be necessary for some to have after Christ ascended, was granted to the apostles. Christ's teaching had not been committed to writing, and it was for the apostles to declare it under the guidance of the Spirit.

W. S. H., Seattle, Wash. We have in our public library a work called the Book of Enoch. Is it reliable authority? The compiler makes many comments, but it does not seem to endorse it fully.

The Book of Enoch is one of the most important remains of early Apocalyptic literature. It received much attention in the early ages of the Church. It is mentioned in Jude (14: 15). You will find a concise history of it in McClintock and Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia. It is excluded from the Christian canon, and was not even received by the Jews, but many early writers thought highly of it.

E. O. S., Evart, Mich. Did the company with Saul, at the time of his conversion near Damascus, hear a voice or not? The two stories in Acts 9: 7 and 22: 9 do not appear to agree.

It is probable that, as in the instance mentioned, John 12: 29, the men with Paul did not hear an articulated voice. To Paul the words were evidently clear, but the men with him heard a confused noise, which they did not understand.

C. N. G., Hudson, N. Y. What is the meaning of the words Dai Nippon, and why are they applied to Japan?

The word Dai, signifies great, while Nippon or Nihon, as it is sometimes pronounced, mean "sun-origin." The latter part of the title was probably used first by the Chinese, since it was from the Japanese Islands, lying to the east of their empire, that the sun came to them.

J. M. D., Reserve, Kans., writes:

I don't think that Mr. Campbell (founder of the Disciples of Christ), ever founded a church; but he asked the people to drop all human creeds, and accept a divine creed only.

Mr. Moses H. Sydenham, of Kearney, Neb., writes:

The Bowery Mission is doing much for the saving of souls and the redemption of the world. Such "lighthouses" are wanted in every city of this Republic, to take the place of cold, half-dead churches, that we shut up all the week except for a mid week prayer-meeting and two services on Sunday. For an aggressive evangelism to overcome the evil in the world there needs to be some changes in the methods of church work, together with some reforms in the conducting of Church services. The pastor on the platform should be backed up by a dozen each of the oldest people in the church, male and female, to face the congregation and have a part of the time usually taken for the sermon, for speaking to the people a few words of testimony, experience, or encouragement for one, two or three minutes, as, with perfect freedom, they may feel like doing. This feature, wisely conducted, would draw very many to the church, and the words of the elders would have great influence. Then let the churches be no longer in the dark every night through the week, but be lighted up like the Bowery Mission, to make more lighthouses to guide storm-tossed sinners from the "highways and hedges" of our cities into the heavenly haven of rest. Church aid societies might start the refreshment phase of Christian work with hot coffee, etc., such as is the custom at the Bowery Mission. Satan has his servants working in his saloons, day and night, every day of the week, and Sundays too when he can hard at work at the business of taking men down to perdition. It is high time that Christians were at the front, doing something for their Lord and Master and the upbuilding of his Kingdom.

Miss Carrie V., Green Valley, N. Y. This correspondent writes that she lives in a small country town. Her father and mother are old, the latter being in very feeble health. She has a great desire to earn something, even if it be but a small sum, as her father cannot work steadily, and as she is needed at home, the work must be something which she can do at odd times.

Mrs. Cynthia Westover Alden's little book, entitled, Women's Ways of Earning Money, contains many hints which are of great value to just such women as our correspondent. The chapter headed "Possible Home Work," contains a number of happy suggestions, in fact the book is full of helpfulness for those who want to help themselves. Mrs. Alden says:

If you can make the prettiest patch-work quilts, the finest jelly, the most luscious pies and delicious cake, the best bread, the daintiest tidies and sofa-cushions, for miles around, why, you must not be buried . . . In the village where you get your supplies, there is a general store. It is your open sesame to success. Use it. Year after year, in the country as well as in the city, busy housewives are tending more and more to buying what they can, instead of making it.

D. A. B., Clemmons, N. C. We should regard any clergyman who dabbled in clairvoyance, hypnotism and mesmerism (three pseudo-sciences, largely in the hands of fakirs and charlatans), as having mistaken his vocation.

Charles B., Newtonville, Mass. Can you give me the name of the author of the following lines:

For God is everywhere, and he doth find
In every atom which his hand hath made,
A shrine to hide his presence, and reveal
His name, love, power, to those who kneel
In holy faith upon this bright below,
And lift their eyes through all this mystery,
To catch the vision of the great beyond?

The author of the lines was Abram J. Ryan, better known as Father Ryan. He was born in Norfolk, Va., August 15, 1839, and died in Louisville, April 22, 1886.

Reader, Fayette, Ia. The only society of the kind we know of is the Ladies' Aid Society.

S. S., Princeton, N. J. If the tablets that have recently been dug up in the Old World prove that the world is thousands of years older than the dates given in the Bible—that is, 4,000 years before Christ—what is the explanation? Is the Bible wrong? Or have those who translated the Bible made a mistake? Or have the scientific men made a mistake? I think it is very perplexing, especially as ministers like Lyman Abbott are stating that the Bible is no longer good authority?

The Bible itself—that is, the text of Scripture—fixes no date for the world's Creation. It simply says, "In the beginning." The dates you see in the margin of the Authorized Version were compiled (about 1620–1640) by Archbishop Ussher, a distinguished prelate, and were very generally accepted, although they were merely human computations and have long ago been shown to be wrong. On the other hand, the wonderful results of the scientific excavations in the Orient are in every essential particular confirmatory and illuminative of the Bible history and not contradictory. For instance, King Sargon is mentioned in Isa. 20: 1, and nowhere else in the Bible. This was thought to be an error, and it was believed that there had never been such a monarch, and that the translators had blundered. But recent excavations have confirmed the obscure reference in the Bible by bringing to light many facts concerning Sargon and his reign. Again, the "Logia," or sayings of Jesus, dug up a few years ago in Palestine, on fragments of papyrus, wonderfully corroborated the Gospel record in many essentials. Many similar instances might be mentioned. As to Dr. Abbott, he has repudiated substantially all the sceptical statements attributed to him, and declares himself a believer in God and in the divinity of Christ.

THE SALVATION ARMY'S CHRISTMAS DINNER AT GRAND CENTRAL PALACE, NEW YORK

At the annual Christmas Dinner given by the Salvation Army this year, the number of poor relieved was estimated at 30,000. The combined Christmas charities of the Army throughout the country relieved 300,000. It is unquestionably one of the greatest Christmas charities in the whole world. The photograph shows only a small number of the great multitude who filled the tables in rapid succession as quickly as they could be served.

THE TRIPLE FALL AT LAGUNA

A Little Tour in the Philippines

By REV. J. EUGENE SNOOK

WHEN making the journey of sixty miles by trail to Mauban early in September, to visit again our little church established last April, it was interesting to find that, among themselves, the members had maintained regular Sunday services, and had also carried the Gospel to their friends on an island some twelve miles out in the Pacific Ocean. One man—an influential member, a captain in Spanish times—has decided to study for the ministry and is now in training for the work. Notwithstanding rain, mud, mountains, treacherous trains, Filipino cooking, the floor to sleep on, open and secret opposition, together with a man's own self to contend with, yet the Lord of the Harvest works together with his laborers and results to his honor follow.

REV. J. EUGENE SNOOK

Our large audiences at Pagsanjan have continued, and some thirty-one adults have been received into the church. In the whole Laguna station, we have baptized during the past ten months 239 adults and sixty-five children. Our first baptismal service in Santa Cruz took place late in September.

Just now there are many encouraging evidences. One in particular will interest you. Nearly two years ago an appeal was made to the friends at home for spare Sunday School papers and other religious periodicals to be mailed here to given addresses among the students of English, which includes not a few middle-aged and elderly people. Recently, a prominent man and provincial official here, who has been reading for some months THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, said, during an evening's conversation in our home: "The Presbyterian Church must be very large and very strong, for I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of its sending its missionaries into all countries. Why does the Presbyterian Church desire to spread everywhere?"

This brought on a long talk about why we, as Protestants, feel that the Gospel should be preached in all parts of the world.

"But," he said, "you are not a Protestant. Many Filipino people ask me about Mr. Snook, and I tell them he is not a Protestant, but a Christian!"

Then we tried to explain that a Protestant was a person who had made a protest.

"Yes," he said, "a protest against God. That is what we have been taught."

The conversation ended with a request for books to read regarding our confession of Faith, and Church constitution, and a short history of the Reformation in Spanish.

One English word, which our friend Mr. Josi Rivera, one of the Commissioners to the St. Louis Exposition, learned and brought back with him, was "picnic." Last Saturday he arranged one such delightful affair. At the river, a block from his beautiful Pagsanjan home, the party embarked in a floating bower of cocoanut palms, shredded banana leaves, and red, white, and blue with chains, built upon three parallel canoes. The clear, broad, winding river, with its high banks and overhanging cocoanut trees, made the spot ideal, and the four hours' outing exceedingly pleasant. So even here, amidst our toil, kind hearts oft lighten labor and nature yields its soothing balm.

The old, old story of our Gospel launch, which is to aid in the telling of a still "older story," seems to need telling again. The fund has grown to $1,800, but $700 are still needed to build the boat. Sickness and other complications last June made impossible the building of the boat, as was then expected. Twenty-three small cities, or 140,000 people residing directly on the lake, await the floating of the Gospel launch, which will more than double the efficiency of the one missionary and wife now in this lake country.

A NATIVE BAND PLAYING NATIONAL AIRS IN MANILA

To the south and east of Manila, at the head of the Pasig River, is the Laguna de Bay, a body of water from five to fifteen miles wide, and nearly seventy-five miles long, having numerous peninsulas and bays, and affording a coast line of 225 miles. Along this water front are numerous small cities, towns and villages, many thousands of people not yet visited by Gospel workers. Emptying into the Laguna de Bay, are many small streams, along which dwell other thousands of people. This is my field, a well watered one, surely. Roads at best are few (in some places none at all) and are useless for a number of months during the year, because of the rainy season; even a two-wheeled vehicle can not be used to advantage. Horseback riding may reach a little farther, but is wonderfully limited.

This settles the matter of traveling for the entire year, because we have no winter; and it would also afford a dwelling. Such a launch, equipped and ready for work here will cost all of $2,000 gold; but it seems to me that a man's usefulness would thus be multiplied at least threefold. With such a launch, supplies for a month or six weeks can be taken from Manila, where they can always be obtained, and trips made through all the region where my work lies. Even should serious disease make its attack, less than one short day would suffice to place the worker in a fully equipped hospital in Manila. In addition to the large territory already described, there is the long coast line of the southern portion of Manila Bay, where this launch would be wonderfully useful in similar work. American missionaries need all their health, strength and time for the work which is especially theirs; and if from a taxing weariness, traveling can be transformed into a season of invigoration, just so much will be gained for the purpose for which they have come to this land.

I send you a photograph of our little church at Luciana, which has 172 baptized members. The building is of bamboo, roofed with cugong grass, and has a hard wood floor. To the left of the photograph is Rev. L. B. Hillis, of Manila, and myself in the centre. I also send two photographs of the famous Botokan Falls, three miles from Luciana and about eighty from Manila. The fall is near 300 feet in height and is well worth seeing. The chasm beneath is filled with beautiful rainbows on a clear day. From near and distant towns and villages comes the call, "Come over and help us." In fact every door is open. There is much land to be possessed, and the outlook is most encouraging.

Santa Cruz, Laguna, P. I.

JESUS THE CARPENTER

A Sermon by REV. FRANK M. BRISTOL, D.D.*

CHRISTIAN society is based upon the ethics of the Gospel. The ideals of life are found in the New Testament. Whatever of character or conduct, theory or practice, sentiment or custom, is out of harmony with the principles of the Christian religion must be repudiated as inimical to the highest and most progressive sociology. The Spirit of the Christ, the spirit of the Kingdom of God, is the spirit of the true and ideal nationalism of the final and perfect civilization. Jesus Christ has fixed the social status of the workingman. The perfect man is a workingman; the ideal man is a workingman.

It has taken thousands of years for the world to catch the significance of the Son of God; laying aside the glory which he had with the Father before the world was, and assuming the garb of an earthly trade; taking upon himself not only the form of a man, but of a workingman—the form of a servant. "Wherefore, God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name." There is the true social status of the laborer in the ideal social system, in the kingdom of heaven, in the perfect Christian civilization. The name above every name is "workingman," "laborer," "servant."

As God gave to his Son the highest honor and the proudest title when he became a servant and took the form of a workingman, so must and so will society, as it becomes Christianized, as it receives the light and truth and Spirit of God, place its highest honors, its brightest titles, its most resplendent crowns upon those whose toil creates the world's wealth, who become obedient (even unto death) to the law of duty and usefulness, obedient to the law that is saving and civilizing humanity.

The Laborer's Status

It is interesting to study what we may call the evolution of the social status of the wage-earners. There was not an ancient civilization in which the laborer had any social status. There was the weakest pillar in every social fabric of antiquity. In the civilization that built the Pyramids, the wage-earner was little better than a beast of burden; indeed, his wage was so small that the ox often had better food and kinder treatment.

The Jews went up out of Egypt with the old Egyptian ideas of class distinctions, of the ignoring of toil, of the contemptibility of service. And with the clay of the brick yards still under their finger-nails, and on their sandals, they began a social system which recognized, what? the dignity of labor?—no, the slavery of labor. But long before this they had learned to look down upon the workingman. It was a lesson for them to learn. There, in their Egyptian servitude, suffering bondage and social contempt, they should have learned the injustice of branding toil with disgrace.

How strangely it sounds to modern American Christian ears to hear this classification of Abraham's possessions: "He had sheep and oxen, and he asses, and men servants and maid servants, and she asses and camels." Of Jacob it was said: "The man increased exceedingly, and had much cattle and maid servants and men servants, and camels and asses." But for ages that was the social status of the servant, of the laborer. His status was with the camels, oxen and asses.

If you study the social system of the Greeks you will find labor held in contempt, and the greatest philosophers taught society to treat labor as a slavery, to despise the working man, to withhold social recognition from the wage-earner.

A Universal Error

Rome aped Greece in art, literature, philosophy and ethics. Hence, as soon as they degenerated from their original republican hardihood and began to assume a civilization, the Romans began to classify citizens; they also virtually assigned the wage-earners to the status of the camels, oxen and asses. There is no doubt whatever that that was the fatal mistake of every ancient social system. It set the brand of ignominy upon the brow of toil; it taught by precept and sentiment the shame of one's having to earn his daily bread. The ideal life was the idle life. Wealth made idleness possible. Therefore, as wealth relieved one of the necessity to labor, it elevated him in the social scale; he was no longer on the level of the camel, the ox, and the ass. He was now a man, a member of society.

When Jesus came, he assumed no dignity when he became a carpenter. What was a carpenter in Rome, or Athens, or Corinth, or Ephesus, or Jerusalem? Even his own countrymen and neighbors sneered at him because he was a carpenter, and by repute the son of a carpenter. If he had been a multi-millionaire, a member of the "leisure class," an aristocrat, they would have followed him for the political and social loaves and fishes, as they did follow him for the material loaves and fishes.

Why did not Jesus Christ come as an aristocrat, as a millionaire, as a temporal being? Why assume the garb of carpenter? Because society needed revolution, regeneration; needed a new foundation; needed a new philosophy of life. It has to be taught that the highest plane in the social scale in the evolution of civilization is not wealth, ease, idleness, pleasure; but labor, duty, service. "Whosoever will be chiefest shall be servant of all."

Recognized by the Church

As Christianity spread among the nations of the earth it met with this same old prejudice against labor which seemed to be universal. The most pronounced distinction was everywhere made between the leisure class and the laboring class. Wealth, usually wealth dishonestly come by, made "the mighty differ." It was not an easy matter for Christianity to overcome this evil. It must be admitted that the Church recognized these distinctions as legitmate, and organized its ecclesiasticism along the lines suggested by social and political prejudices. It was an easy matter for an ecclesiasticism that recognized in its very priesthood the distinction of princes and potentates, to become allied to political governments and social orders which oppressed the people by their aristocratic, oligarchical, despotic or monarchial institutions. The union of the Church and State helped to preserve these iniquitous social distinctions, until oppression, political and ecclesiastical, became so intolerable, that the conscience and independence of the common people rebelled, and shook the thrones and institutions of class government in Church and State to their foundations in the Reformation, the French Revolution, and the American Revolution.

In the rise of our new nationalism we behold the leaven of Christian brotherhood at work. The spirit of the Christ has put a new dignity upon labor, and with that new dignity has come the inspiration which has made possible the triumphs of our material development. Here has risen a new race of the Sons of God: this American democracy of free men. Here the great spring from the loins of the humble; our best artizans, inventors, teachers, soldiers, authors, financiers and statesmen are the sons of working people. And no race ever gave the world a stronger, more virile, more high-minded progeny than did the founders of this Republic.

The best sentiment of our Americanism is in sympathy with honest and intelligent toil. The only man who has good blood in him is the man who can trace his ancestry back to the plough, the factory, the shovel, the mine, the mill, the forge, the carpenter shop. The degenerates are coming from the leisure class. American society professes to be founded on the teachings of Jesus Christ. If it is, then the only true aristocracy is the aristocracy of the common people. The head of the ideal social system is not a man of leisure, he is not a politician, a stock jobber, an aristocrat, a financier, a society beau, but he is—a Carpenter.

But with all our boasted liberty, equality, democracy, and Christian brotherhood, there seems to be developing an un-Christian, an un-democratic, an un-American sentiment in society, which looks up to wealth and looks down on toil. With our growing greatness and wealth is there danger in the development of the aristocratic spirit? Is deference to wealth seen in government affairs? Why are the rich preferred for office? Why are our governors, law-makers, judges and presidents more accessible to the rich than to the poor? Why is more consideration paid to money than to toil, to the railroad magnate than to the railroad laborer, to the capitalist than to the carpenter? "So ought it to be?" says one. No, that idea must be repudiated or else Christ must be repudiated. The only distinctions to be made in Christian society are moral distinctions.

Contemptible Prejudice

I am not saying that you or anyone should promiscuously invite to every social function all people whether agreeable or not, but simply that to draw a line at labor, because it is labor; to socially ignore the wage-earner, because he or she is a wage-earner, is contemptible, un-Christian, pagan, heathen snobbishness, and the people who do it belong in Spain or China, and not in this free democratic America. There is not a person of such narrow boorish aristocratic assumption in this country whose grandfather didn't work in his shirt sleeves, and whose grandmother didn't do her own washing. And the grandparents of these modern snobs of society would themselves be snubbed by the social four hundred if they were to come back to earth on a visit to their degenerate grandchildren.

The snobbiest snob is the American snob! He is a cheat and fraud without an honest title, without a legitimate pedigree of snobbery. He had an honest and respectable ancestry, of which he has become ashamed. He sprang from the great, high-minded American democracy, but has disgraced it. There is some excuse for the born snob of a snob-worshiping country, as there is some excuse for the criminal who was born in jail, but there is no excuse for either the pickpocket or drunkard or the social snob who deliberately makes himself one, and glories in the infamous distinction. To-day the most honest and honorable men, the purest, most virtuous women in America, are the descendants of wage-earners, and are not ashamed of it; who are brothers and sisters of him who was the Carpenter, and belonged to no aristocracy but the aristocracy of the sons of God.

What is the social status of that honest young man who has to earn his bread by the sweat of his face? In the eyes of the Carpenter of Nazareth his social status is at the top; in the eyes of the degenerate snob he has no social status. His social status depends upon his money, not his manhood.

What is the social status of that pure and virtuous woman who has to earn her own living, but does it bravely and virtuously? In the eye of the degenerate creature of fashion and society, that woman, that brave, pure, wage-earning woman, does not belong to society; but in the eyes of the Carpenter of Nazareth, who loved and honored the sisters of Bethany, she is one of the queens of the royal society of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Respect for Labor

If our growing wealth and power encourage a cringing, servile worship of money, and the development of that meanest, most ignorant, most sensual, most godless of all aristocracies—a money aristocracy—then the quicker God blasts our prosperity, blights our harvests, withholds the early and latter rain, and brings us to national bankruptcy the better for human virtue and the safer for human liberty. Thank God, there are those among us who grow rich in a manly, Christian spirit. With all their wealth they never snub labor because it is labor. They never look down with supercillious contempt upon the poor because they are poor, nor treat any fellow-man as an inferior simply because he is a wage-earner. All honor to such men, gentlemen, Americans; nature's noblemen.

There are women who live in an honestly acquired luxury who never think of branding their sister women with contempt for having to earn their daily bread. With all their wealth they recognize the true womanhood whether it be clad in calico or silk, and never draw the social line at the cottage door of the sister who earns the household bread. All honor to such

Copyright, 1904, by Clinedinst

As announced last week, considerable space in the present issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is devoted to the presentation of a National Symposium, in which the leading men and women of the country are the contributors. It was suggested several weeks ago, to the Editor of this journal, that the incoming of a new Administration, under the most hopeful auspices, would be a fitting time for an expression of representative public opinion concerning the high opportunities that are most immediately available, and which, during the next four years, might be utilized to exert the greatest influence on the moral and material progress of the nation. With this view, letters were addressed to the foremost men and women of every State, recognized leaders of public thought and action, inviting them to give a brief expression of their views concerning the thing most to be desired by the American people during the coming four years of President Roosevelt's Administration.

Their responses, which are printed below, are representative of the highest and most enlightened thought on the sociological, humanitarian, economic and patriotic problems of the present day, and indicate the trend of public opinion in a manner not to be mistaken. No one having the welfare of the nation at heart, and who has a desire for its progress along the highest lines, can read these remarkable letters without being deeply impressed by the patriotic sincerity of the writers, by the entire absence of any self-seeking or political motive, and by the further fact, that deep down in the hearts of all thoughtful men and women throughout our beloved land, there is a feeling of sympathy and cordial approval of the suggestions advanced by the writers as a whole, for the reason that they are in accord with the true American idea of "peace, progress and prosperity," and with national honor and righteousness.

It should be added that nothing is further from the purpose of the contributors, or indeed of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, than that the Symposium should be interpreted as advice to the President. It is due to the distinguished writers of these letters that this should be clearly disclaimed. At the same time, the views expressed are of such momentous interest to the whole nation, and the exalted position of the writers commands such general attention, that it would be surprising indeed if these utterances passed unheeded in the very quarter where their consideration might lead to the greatest public advantage.

A Government of "Equal Rights to All and Special Privileges to None"

IF the word "hope" is so defined as to include expectation, I am not sufficiently informed as to the President's plans to answer intelligently. If your question calls for an opinion as to the thing most to be desired, I would answer: The administration of Government according to the Jeffersonian maxim, "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none," to the end that "a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people," may not perish from the earth. Special privilege rests upon injustice, and injustice always weakens a Government.

International Arbitration and Respect for Law and Order at Home

NONE more fittingly than the brave may counsel peace. There is no incongruity in Theodore Roosevelt, the intrepid Rough Rider, the exponent of the "strenuous life," preaching the doctrine of patience, mutual concession, respect for law and order. And in this direction lies an achievement to be hoped for during the coming four years of his Administration; vital, too, for the existence of this Republic, the grave danger now confronting it is the growing contempt for law. A good government gives its citizens tribunals for the determination of their rights, and tolerates no resort to violence for that purpose. International arbitration is but an extension of this principle, and Mr. Roosevelt, during his coming Administration, will not only seek to improve conditions in this respect within our own borders, but will make an earnest effort to secure peace within the family of nations. The awful waste of life and property in war is a relic of barbarism and a reproach to our civilization. No brighter page could adorn the record of any Administration than one recording a substantial advance toward the abolition of this brutal arbitrament.

Push Work on the Canal and Discourage Reckless Expenditures of Public Funds

TO have the country continue to prosper under the blessing of Providence, as it has during the last four years, and to strengthen, if possible, the confidence of the people in the patriotic and conservative administration of the Federal Government. However wise and patriotic an Administration may be, it needs the confidence and support of the people to realize the full benefit of such wisdom and patriotism.

We should advance as rapidly as possible the great constructive work of the Panama Canal, so that its benefits to the world's commerce and civilization will be speedily realized, and I hope that this great gateway of the world's commerce will strengthen the friendship of all nations for the Republic. These would, it seems to me, be the most desirable things for which we could hope; and we should also hope for an increasing recognition of the responsibility resting upon the citizenship, for the economical legislation of Congress in support of all legitimate public policies, but the discouragement of reckless expenditure of public money for policies which do not properly belong to the domain of Federal power, and for the maintenance and respect of law throughout the whole Republic.

Equality of Burdens, Commercial Fair Play, and Peace and Justice Within our Borders

I CAN say in a word what goes without saying—that "the most desirable thing to be hoped for the American people during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration," is equality of burdens in either direct or indirect taxation, real equality and fair play in the administration of the commercial intercourse of the people of the various States, and peace and justice in every place within the dominions of the United States.

We Should Take the Lead in All Measures for Arbitration and the Peace of the World

ONE of the things most to be hoped for is that the American people will earnestly support every effort, by treaties and by other means, to secure the arbitration of differences among the nations. That is a great work for a peaceful country like ours. We want to set an example for other nations. We are disinterested in our desire for peace. I am old enough to have known enough of war. I hope, above all things, that during the next four years there will be no fresh wars, and that the whole world will take a step forward in finding means for the peaceful settlement of international disputes.

We can do our share by securing the ratification of the arbitration treaties that may be negotiated by President Roosevelt and Secretary Hay.

Aggressive Integrity in the Public Service, A High Standard of Official Responsibility, Postal Improvement and Arbitration

MANY desirable things are to be hoped for during the next four years, and some of them are certain to be realized under President Roosevelt's Administration, especially aggressive integrity in the public service and a high standard of official responsibility.

For the Post-office Department it is to be hoped that its means of spreading intelligence will continue to meet the demands of the public. But above all things to be desired, is the support by the American people of the measures for enlarging the sphere of arbitration, and the continuance of the present great influence of the United States in the peace movements of the world.

Complete the Canal and Strengthen our Influence in the Western Hemisphere

I KNOW of no more desirable thing to be hoped for during the next Presidential period than the completion, if possible, of the Panama Canal. The influence it will exert in the expansion of our commercial relations with other countries; its influence in strengthening our naval forces on either side of the continent, and its influence in shortening routes traversed by our coastwise trade, give it primary importance among attainable national desires. It may not be completed within four years; but the power that will be developed by utilizing the water power of rivers will enable contractors, through artificial lights, to use all of the twenty-four hours of each day, and thus duplicate the amount of work to be done each day, that was in the mind of the engineers, when, heretofore, estimates were made.

Re-establish our Merchant Marine—the Weakest Spot in our National Policy

IT seems to me that during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration, nothing is more to be hoped for than the re-establishment of the American Merchant Marine. The way our foreign shipping interests have been permitted to languish marks the weakest spot in our national policy. In the early days of the Republic, and up to 1828, American merchant ships carried over ninety per cent. of our foreign commerce. Now they carry seven per cent. and $200,000,000 a year goes to foreign shipowners to pay them for doing what we ourselves should do—carry our own goods in our own ships.

Increased Respect for Moral and Statute Law the Thing Most Greatly Needed

THERE are many desirable things to be hoped for by the American people during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration. Perhaps the most desirable thing to be hoped for, and to be expected, is an increased respect for law. President Roosevelt stands for this pre-eminently as above all other things. I mean by "an increased respect for law," not merely an acquiescence in statutory provisions, but a respect for moral law as well. President Roosevelt's attitude relative to labor unions, trusts, and all sorts of combinations is on the very highest plane, and I am sure that his precepts will find not only hearty response in the minds of the people of our country, but will secure a reflection in action. The administration of statute law on a fair and unbiased basis insures respect for moral law. This is needed in very many directions in this country a more thorough acquiescence in great principles as belonging to the results of the decisions of the courts and the statutes of legislatures. Our judiciary, both Federal and State, stands upon a very high plane. Lapses here and there result

A Less Technical and More Practical Civil Service, to be Better Understood and More Appreciated by our People

SO many great things are to be desired, so many with portentous and widespread results, so many with hope and brightness in their future, that I will not undertake to say which I do think will be the most desirable. But in the matter of the civil service, I believe that it may be hoped for during the Administration of President Roosevelt, that the civil service administration will become less technical, more practical, indescribably more understood and appreciated and used by the American people.

Already the hope of entering the public service has stimulated the cause of education in almost every neighborhood, and in almost every station in American life. The scholar, the mechanic, the artist, the specialist and the laborer, all now appreciate the opportunities which a justly administered civil service affords to an industrious, intelligent man, and from this stimulation there has come a study of the Government, its relations to peoples, its power in the causing of events that has tended to the destruction of mere localism and sectionalism, and has made the citizen everywhere proud of, and happy in his Government.

AMONG the things most to be hoped for is that the people of the United States will secure closer relations with peo-ple of the other countries on this continent. This can be done by increasing their means of intercourse for commerce and for travel. The Pan-American Railway, connecting all the republics, will be one of the best means of securing such result. Make International Arbitration Binding Upon the Civilized Nations of the World

A QUESTION of such scope as the one asked offers a wide field for the presentation of ideals, "most undesirable," perhaps, but, under existing conditions, unattainable. It is assumed that the question refers rather to possibilities not too remote from realization to make them subjects for public consideration and endeavor.

"The most desirable thing" for any nation is peace with the rest of the world. Beyond the sentimental desire for such a state, the practical benefits which accrue to the political, economic and moral life of a people are too apparent to require argument.

There is no method which can so surely preserve the friendship between nations as the submission of controversies, which have failed of diplomatic adjustment, to the judgment of an impartial tribunal. As an agent for the maintenance of the world's peace, international arbitration is at once the most effective, most practical and most attainable. Already much has been accomplished, and more will be accomplished during President Roosevelt's Administration. A great international court has been created; many of the Powers have agreed to submit a certain class of cases to that court in every event; a second gathering of the nations at The Hague in the near future seems assured, and the wider extension of the court's operation also seems assured.

If the civilized nations were bound to submit to international arbitration every question arising between them, without reservation as to the character of the question or the subject-matter involved, the era of universal peace would be no longer an ideal, but would become a reality. Thus, "the most desirable thing" for the world, as well as for the United States, would be accomplished.

Stop Banks and Other Corporations from Making Contributions to Campaign Funds

THE most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people during the next four years, is the passage of laws prohibiting national banks and other corporations from contributing from their corporation treasuries money in aid of political parties. Such laws should pass both Congress and State legislatures. If corporations can use their funds for such purposes without restriction, government by the people is sure to be destroyed. While this is the most desirable and fundamental thing, there should also be promptly adopted a national law authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix railroad rates of fares and freights and punishing the issue of free passes. If the present complete railroad ownership of both political parties can be annihilated, the free people will wisely and safely decide, through their legislators and the men whom they may elect to office, the various other important questions.

A "Square Deal" for our Wards, the Red Men, and an Avoidance of Past Blunders

IN the Indian field, the most desirable thing is the "square deal." Not every Indian is a cumberer of the ground, not every frontiersman is an oppressor. The friction which is inevitable between the two races while one of them is settling into its place in the body politic, ought to be reduced to a minimum by fair treatment of both sides, not increased by needlessly keeping alive unfragrant memories.

With the old red man, the victim of past blunders, we can do nothing beyond making his declining years as comfortable as possible. The middle-aged we must help through a most trying transition stage. Exert our Influence Toward the Abolition of War and the Upholding of International Arbitration

IN my judgment, the most desirable work of constructive statesmanship to be hoped for in President Roosevelt's Administration, is to lead the way towards the pacification of nations, through the constitution of a universal tribunal of arbitration, to which such nations can look for an impartial and intelligent judgment upon the differences that may from time to time arise between them. While the total abolition of war may, under present conditions of thought, be still a distant dream, yet this Republic should exert its ever-increasing influence to narrow the occasions, and therefore the justification of armed conflict. To the great work of the permanent pacification of humanity, no nation can make a greater contribution than ours, and no previous President ever had a greater opportunity for such permanent service to mankind than the present President of the United States.

International Peace, a Higher Civil Service Standard and Better Municipal Rule

ONE of the very first things which we may expect President Roosevelt and his Administration to attempt, and to secure, will be treaties of arbitration with the leading nations of the world. Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt have done more to make the settlement of international difficulties possible by arbitration than all preceding Presidents of the United States. President Roosevelt and Secretary Hay are to-day leading the world along these same lines. America never had so queenly a position among the nations as she has to-day. The world heartily recognizes her lofty position and gladly follows her nobler leadership. The President is the foremost figure on the international stage to-day.

Dissolve the Partnership Between Government and the Liquor Traffic

THE most desirable thing to be hoped for, and least expected, during the next four years, is that the Administration will dissolve the profit-sharing partnership existing between the Government and legalized liquor traffic. This would deprive the traffic of its present dignity and protection as a government institution. It would aid in turning the fourteen hundred millions of dollars now spent annually for poisonous beverages into the channels of legitimate trade, which would greatly increase the demand for the useful industries and their products, such as clothing, food, and shelter for the now liquor-submerged tenth of our population. It would put an end to the cry of "over production," since it is not from this that we are suffering, but rather from "under consumption" of the necessaries of life. It would help to save from debauchery, moral ruin and eternal death, the 100,000 annual victims of the drink curse, and bring joy and happiness where there is now sorrow and misery.

A Great Evangelistic Movement which Shall Take the World for Christ

THE conversion of the world for Christ. The Bible declares that when the Gospel shall be preached unto all nations, then shall the end come. The Gospel was never so powerfully and universally preached as it is to-day. In our own lands the evangelistic movements of Methodists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians have never been more pronounced. The Administration of Thomas Jefferson was noted for its signing of the Treaty with Tripoli, and that of James Madison for its Treaty of Ghent, and that of James K. Polk for its Treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo — by which all the difficulties of the Mexican War were settled—and that of Abraham Lincoln for its settlement of the negro slavery question, and that of William McKinley for its Treaty of Paris. May the Administration of Theodore Roosevelt be noted for the consummation of all evangelistic movements in the conquest of a sinful world for Jesus Christ.

Curb Capitalistic Lawlessness and Protect the People from the Vile Liquor Traffic

IN my opinion, the most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people during the four years of President Roosevelt's administration is:

1st. Some action fundamental enough to be a real answer to the problem along the line of industrial reform, in putting an end to the lawlessness of capital, which, to my mind, breaks more laws than organized labor ever dreamed of breaking, and making it impossible in the future for great combinations, like railroads, trusts, and stock companies, to make something out of nothing.

2d. It is my earnest desire, shared by very many others, that during President Roosevelt's Administration something may be done by this Government to recognize the liquor business as one of the greatest foes of the Republic, not simply from its menace to moral and physical well-being, which every one now concedes, but as a destructive economic factor which the Government ought to recognize, and take steps to shield the people from the enormous loss caused by a business which is an enemy of the human race. I think myself, that by this time the people of the United States have a right to expect a Christian President of the United States to go on record, positively and clearly, concerning what he thinks is the best remedy for the final annihilation of such a curse. And I also think it is high time this Government went out of the business of getting revenue from the liquor business.

Restore Universal Peace and Build a Pan-American Railroad from Hudson's Bay to Patagonia

TWO years ago, I delivered an address on "The Five Great Duties of the Century." It was delivered to the young men and women of the University of Ohio.

I said then, and I am glad you give me an opportunity to repeat what I said, that the first of the five great duties for Americans is the restoration of universal peace among all civilized nations.

For our own activity the first duty in this direction seems to me to be the establishment of a Pan-American Railroad from Hudson's Bay to Patagonia. I think this should be done by the co-operation of the various governments involved. Of these, it is easy to see that the government of the United States has by far the largest share. We are responsible for the undertaking, and we should look forward with pride to its success.

dore Roosevelt to the Presidency for the next four years. It is not too much to say that Mr. Roosevelt, in his robust and cheerful vigor and forceful personality, is typical and representative of the best we have to show in the Republic. But, speaking from the standpoint only of a woman in her home, I feel that we may look during his Administration for a truer democracy, for growth in the sentiment of brotherhood that obliterates caste and brings closer together the rich and the poor, for a sweeter and fuller home life, and a return to the simplicity which inhered in our earlier American ideals. LIKE most other Americans, I rejoice in the election of a scholarly Christian gentleman as President of the United States, a man with convictions and courage as well.

I can ask nothing better than that the people be brought up to the political standards of the President, and that the same high ideals of honesty, hatred of "graft," respect for the rights of all, and God-fearing probity, may characterize the nation, so that even the suspicion of unjust and selfish deals and political corruption, which has sometimes made our cities a byword and a hissing, may never again attach to the fair name "America."

A Clear Understanding and Closer Application of the Golden Rule

IN my opinion, the most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration, is a clearer understanding and a closer application of the Golden Rule of Christ. This would involve the truths as expressed in The Simple Life, and an exemplification of the real meaning of "the brotherhood of man," concerning which the President has such exalted ideas. Under this "Rule," the liquor traffic would loosen its hold upon individuals and the nation, and the legalized saloon would disappear as naturally as the vapor vanishes through the bright shining of the sun.

Improve Foreign Relations and Raise the Standard of Government at Home

THE earnest which President Roosevelt has already given of his character and intentions, causes me to look forward with much hope to the results of his second term of office. We see a clean-handed, clear-headed gentleman at the head of our Government, one who understands and appreciates his own country and other countries as well. This boon has not been the result of every Presidential election since the presence of Washington adorned the White House.

I believe that during the four years soon to open out before us, our intercourse with other nations will be characterized by firmness, and by the spirit of impartial justice. I trust that more crying evils, both at home and abroad, will be sensibly abated. I feel sure that our dependencies will be led to advance steadily in education and intelligence, and that their relation to us will become more and more one of affection and confidence.

I cannot but feel that the best elements of our society will come into renewed activity during the period in question.

Surely, our best manhood and womanhood should gather around such a man as our President, and help him to lift the agencies of administration above the plane of those ambitions which prompt men to reach the highest honors with the poorest and meanest motives.

SOME years ago, a distinguished lawyer, the counsel for a great manufacturing corporation, said to a prominent man, who was protesting against a contemplated increase of tariff burdens: "I don't see why you should mind a slight increase like this."

For the purposes of this anecdote, the manufactured article under discussion shall be called buttons.

"In point of fact," continued the lawyer, "the increase in the price of buttons for the public will be only about a cent on each card—and it means the making of millions for my clients."

When one considers that, added to a few cents each year on buttons; more on ice; more still on food,—cereals, meats, groceries of all kinds; coal, clothing, furnishings,—everything that we use: are dollars more paid to the trusts yearly, in small but cruelly pinching ways, from the pockets of all of us: then we must realize that what we most want of our good and honest President, is that he shall carry out to the bitter end his war upon the trusts. Let them be compelled to "open their books," and to account for all their doings before a stern federal tribunal. Let them be forced to take off that unnecessary "cent a card," which is squeezing the life out of the poor all over our land, and rolling up millions of unearned profits for the rich corporations.

Higher Civic Patriotism, Friendship with Other Nations, and the Spread of Education at Home

I HOPE for a spiritual tidal wave to sweep away our shameful apathy at widespread corruption and lawlessness; for a new respect paid to civic patriotism; for less timidity at fear of foreign attack; for a better understanding of human nature which shall prevent our expecting to preserve peace by a suspicious, bumptious attitude toward sister nations; for a doubling of our expenditure for public schools, and a reduction by one-half of military expenditure which now equals that of all our public schools, and is wildly on the increase; for strenuous efforts to neutralize and gain the protection of Christendom for our Pacific Islands, and for the promotion of a defensive alliance of the South American States, thus relieving us of any possible excuse for a large navy.

Solve the Great National Problem of the American Saloon

WE are told that "faith is the substance of things hoped for," and we infer from this inspired definition, that unless we hope for a good thing, we are not likely to obtain it. So in the face of a gloomy probability to the contrary, we may claim the right to hope that during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration, something radical and definite may be accomplished in the solving of the gravest problem before the American people to-day, namely: the American saloon. The governmental control of railroads, the regulation of trusts and monopolies; tariff reform, and other vital questions affecting the health and well-being of the body politic, will be discussed and practically decided in the saloon, by men whose brains are clouded by liquor. Do away with the American saloon and its train of attendant evils, and all other needed reforms will come about naturally and inevitably. Nor will we continue as a nation in the disgraceful business of manufacturing drunkards, prostitutes, and criminals out of our innocent boys and girls, to be the curse of coming generations.

Exalt National Righteousness, and Perpetuate Peace and Prosperity

"LEST we forget," and as a nation build on other foundation than Christ laid — He being the "Corner Stone"—or lest we become individually a law to ourselves. St. Paul wrote emphatically: "Be subject to the powers that be, ready for every good work, after the kindness and love of God our Saviour. But avoid foolish questions, striving about the law."

"Lest we forget" to bring Zenas, the lawyer (Secretary Hay might fill the bill this time), that nothing be wanting to maintain good work, and "order heaven's first law," linked with justice, and law-abiding citizenship, and no hatred; casting down vain imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself; bringing into captivity every form of insubordination; fulfilling the divine law of love. "Forget not, all this benefits." Psalm 103. The above words of St. Paul, if taken heed to, cannot fail to perpetuate peace and prosperity to our glorious nation.

Banish "Graft," Simplify our Social Life and Avoid International and Other Complications

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT once gave three rules for football: "Don't foul, don't flinch, hit the line hard." Then he added that they were equally good rules for life, but that there was still another to be added unto them, "No matter what comes you mustn't squeal."

If during the next four years these rules could be so applied as to banish "politics" and "graft" from every form of activity and at the same time to call forth a greater simplicity in social life, a new era of personal righteousness would have arisen.

But if to "hit the line hard," is interpreted as meaning that it is our duty to serve as an international policeman or chivalric protector over other countries, or as a parental legislator to interfere with the legitimate affairs of our separate States and of individual and corporate business, then we shall have "hit the line" so hard that we ourselves become the final sufferers.

Urge Arbitration, Check Naval Expansion, Control the Corporations and Make Laws for Equitable Distribution of Wealth

THE most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration is, in my opinion, the signing of arbitration treaties with all the nations of the civilized world, and the checking of the expansion of the United States navy, that we may no longer strengthen the spirit of militarism in Europe, but lead the way to international disarmament. Next to this is the more effective regulation and control of the great corporations, and the passage of such laws as will assist in the more equitable distribution of wealth.

The Checking of the Spirit of Aggression and Militarism, and the Advancing of the World's Peace

THE most desirable thing which could possibly be achieved for the American people in the immediate future, is the checking of the spirit of aggression and militarism which we have been witnessing in the last half dozen years, and the courageous assumption of a more ambitious and chivalric leadership as the great peace power of the world.

May we go into this new Hague Conference to lead there in the effort for the world's disarmament; and may we show that we are in earnest, by decreeing —now when we are ten times stronger and safer, than in the day of Jefferson's magnificent confidence and aspiration — that not another dollar of the people's money, so sorely needed for great constructive purposes, shall be wasted in multiplying battleships, whose increase now makes vastly more for danger than for defence? If, in a world of great and varied

A Union of Forces to Combat Unrighteousness at Home and Abroad

IN my opinion, the most desirable thing is the strengthening of the forces both at home and abroad in a union to combat unrighteousness. In our own country we have begun a movement in many of our large cities and some States, along the lines of civic reformation. No republic can last except it be founded upon righteousness. With righteousness at home, America can then lead in a movement for the relief of the oppressed abroad, and the Congo atrocities, Armenian massacres and Russian outrages against the Jews, afford sufficient ground for united effort on the part of Christian nations in relieving the oppressed.

Fraternal Feeling Between North and South, and Let Every Man Feel that he is a Citizen

AMONG the things to most earnestly be desired during the next four years, is that the fraternal feeling between the North and South will grow so strong that every citizen of this great land of ours will feel that he is the citizen of our common country, and is interested in everything that relates to its material progress and its moral welfare.

The tercentennial of the settlement of the English people at Jamestown in 1607, which gave birth to liberty and law on this continent, and which is the greatest event that has ever happened next to the voyages of Columbus, is to be celebrated by an international naval display, by military manœuvres, and by an Exposition on Hampton Roads. Such an Exposition should serve to reawaken historic and patriotic associations, and recall to our people how closely those who settled at Plymouth and those who settled at Jamestown were indentified in the civilization of the New World.

world's peace, and by negotiating arbitration treaties with all the great powers of Europe.

This I regard as the greatest achievement of the first Roosevelt Administration; and the most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people during the second Administration of President Roosevelt, is that these praiseworthy efforts, initiated by him and Secretary Hay, may be crowned with success.

If so, the present Administration will go down into history as the most glorious of all, and as one upon which the plaudits and blessings of all mankind will justly be bestowed.

A Government for the People, and Not for the Politicians: Safeguards Against Official Rascality

THE present Administration can, and I think it will, strengthen the belief of the American people that governments rightfully exist only for the good of the governed, and in no wise for the good of those in power, except in so far as these share in the general welfare. To do this, it must teach by example that public offices belong to the people and not to their holders or to politicians; that public servants are chosen for fitness to do the people's work, not because they cannot make a living otherwise, nor yet because their time and salaries may be useful to those getting them their jobs.

Administer the Government in the Interest of the Whole People and Keep Social Problems Uppermost

THE American people may hope with entire confidence, that President Roosevelt will administer the duties of his high office not in the interest of a party, or of a class, or of himself, but of the whole people.

That he is close to the people, and has an intelligent appreciation of that which is fundamental to their well-being, is indicated by the fact that he devoted one-third of his message to social problems.

That he is a man of the people was demonstrated at the polls; and that the people made no mistake, will, I believe, be demonstrated by his Administration.

Increased National Righteousness and an Advance Against All the Forces of Evil

SPIRITUAL progress is admitted to be the most important, therefore, our greatest hope as a people, must be for that. President Roosevelt stands for the highest ideals of the American people, and his leadership during the next four years will undoubtedly make for national righteousness.

His personal interest in the great spiritual movements of our time; for example, in the Young Men's Christian Associations, to take one kind, and in the cause of international justice by arbitration, to take another kind, will be of very great value to all who are engaged in such movements. We may not only hope but expect to see, under such a captain, an advance all along the line in our battle with the forces of evil.

JESUS AT THE FEAST

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

JESUS at a wedding! as if to proclaim the sacredness of marriage. The mother of Jesus prominent, to honor motherhood! This but the first of many Bible feasts in which Jesus was the centre of pure joys! "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it;" whithersoever you go, be glad to know that he, too, is there—that will make all life a feast of joy.

Cana is only a few miles from Nazareth, and so the children of the two places often played together in the beautiful Valley of Esdraelon, and about the Lake of Galilee. Probably the bride and groom of this wedding had played with Jesus in childhood, and lunched at his mother's table, and so they were both invited, and the disciples of Jesus also, to the wedding.

We can give only a few moments to the vexed question of the wine. Whatever kind it was that Jesus made, there is none of it left for us. There surely were two kinds of wine then, as there are two kinds now, when unfermented wine is becoming a familiar sight. To the writer it seems to be one of the can nots of character, that Jesus could not have made the "red" wine that his Bible calls a "mocker" and forbids us even to "look" upon. What he gave at the Lord's Supper was called the "fruit of the vine." The wine that makes "woe" and "sorrow" can hardly have been the wine Jesus created to make joy and gladness. When the wine failed, his mother, feeling for some reason that Jesus could provide it, prompted him to do something to save the feast from failure. If we could have heard how gently Jesus said, "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come," we should not debate whether he was rude to his mother. No doubt it was, in some sense, a correction of her mistake in urging him to do his miracle before he was ready. She took the lesson gracefully, and said to the servants what well may be the watchword of our lives, "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." The sequel illustrated that "all God's bidlings are enablings."

"Water!" the Master cried. All sound was hushed;
And when the water-jars were brought to him,
"The conscious water saw its God and blushed!"
Oh! never wine like this did ever brim
Immortal cups, since first the grape was crushed. L. WHEELER.

This was borne to the master of the feast, who tasted it, not knowing its origin, and pronounced it "the best" wine. Of course it was "the best," as is everything that Christ gives us. Especially are the joys he gives "the best." The miracle not only changed water to wine, but hesitation to faith in the hearts of his disciples. So "weakness becomes completeness in another's greater strength."

During the recent Sunday School Jerusalem cruise, Cana was visited. It is a small and dirty town of not over one hundred and fifty population, with immense hedges of cactus. We were shown into a church said to contain some of the actual jars used by Christ in turning the water into wine. One of our party, Mrs. Zillah Foster Stevens, preferred to remain outside of the church and talk with the children, who were following us from place to place. She told the children that she was from St. Louis, in the United States. Immediately one of the girls, about twelve years of age, gave a look of glad surprise and darted away, coming back presently with a letter which she said she had written to her brother in St. Louis, but did not dare to trust to the Turkish post. Would Mrs. Stevens take it to her brother? How could she? There was no street address on it, simply the Arabic name. In vain Mrs. Stevens tried to explain that St. Louis was a great city, where people could not find each other as in little Cana. But the girl insisted, and Mrs. Stevens took the letter in charge. When she returned to St. Louis, many weeks afterward, she began her search for the young Syrian. First she sent a note addressed to him at the General Delivery, but it was returned marked, "Not found." She searched through Jerusalem, at the Fair, but without avail. One day she met a Syrian selling pressed flowers from Palestine. She asked him if he knew the young man she was searching for, and he replied that he did, and that he would take the letter to him. But Mrs. Stevens desired to take the letter to him herself, after carrying it so many thousand miles. She was told that in a few days he would take the position of a guide in Jerusalem, at the Fair; and there she delivered the letter to him, a few days later. The brother received the letter with joy, and told Mrs. Stevens that it contained the news that his sister would shortly be married, and so here is an up-to-date wedding story connected with Cana, and Christ is in it, too, for all concerned were Christians.

Before we take up the two main lessons of this incident, let us pause for a Scotch illustration of what miracles really are: "I regard a miracle," said uncle, "to be merely such an interference wi' the established coorse o' things as infallibly shows us the presence and the action o' a supernatural pooer. What o'clock is it wi' you, sir, if you please?"—"It is half-past twelve, exactly, Greenwich time," replied Smith. "Well, sir," said uncle, pulling a huge old time-piece from his pocket, "it's ane o'clock wi' me. I generally keep my watch a bitte forrit. But I may hae a special reason noo for setting my watch by the railway; and so, see ye, I'm turnin' the hauns o't around. Noo, wad ye say that I hae violated the laws o' a watch? True, I hae dune what watchdom, wi' a' its laws cooldna hae dune for itself; but I hae dune violence to nane o' its laws. My action is only the interference o' a superior intelligence for a suitable end; but I hae suspended nae law, violated nae law. Weel, then, instead o' the watch, say the universe; instead o' moving the hauns, say God acting worthily of himsel', and we hae a' that I contend for in a miracle; that is, the unquestionable presence of an Almighty haun workin' the divine will."

THE FEAST AT AN ORIENTAL WEDDING

1. The Sacredness of Marriage. For all except children, the great teaching of this lesson is the sacredness of marriage. Roman Catholics call marriage a "sacrament," but strangely put higher honor upon celibacy, required of nuns and priests. Let us not be in too much haste to argue that marriage is not a "sacrament." Neither is it as infidels teach, a mere "contract." It is at least a very sacred thing, established as it was, by God in Eden's innocence, and greatly honored by Christ by association with his first miracle. Honored also in that the Bible all through represents the relation of Christ to the Church as that of bridegroom and bride. How true conjugal love is like faith in God in displacing selfishness Tennyson suggests:

"Love took up the harp of life and smote on all its chords with might,
Smote the chord of self, which, trembling, passed in music out of sight."

Only a reverent, Christianized love of husband and wife leads away from selfishness, the heart being drawn out by wife and child as the tides are drawn by sun and moon. No one so well understands the divine Fatherhood as one who is a whole-souled parent. Nothing so helps to human brotherhood as the family life of a truly Christian home.

There are three important items of home statistics that are food for thought. Federation, the organ of co-operating churches in New York City, reported in July, 1903, that only 16.6 per cent. of the Hebrew families of that city are without children, while 28.3 per cent. of Protestant families are childless. Mr. J. A. Collins, in the American Magazine of Civics (Feb. 1895), showed that this country has a smaller proportion of home owners than any other country except Great Britain. Australia leads with ninety per cent., and we are next to the foot of the list with only thirty per cent. Another item that should interest the young people who think they cannot make a home on less than $1,000 a year, is that more than half the families in the United States have an income of less than $600, and it is probable that half has, in anticipation of the bridal, about as much of home love and joy as the other half.

2. Christ in our Feasts of Joy. Life is a feast. If it be a worldly life the best wine is at first, and then that which is worse; but in the Christian life the best is at the last, and it is good all through. "Will Jesus come to the feast?" is a good test. It is not worth while to go where it is not pleasant to remember that he is there. All through his biography we hear of him at feasts. None have more "good times" than those who keep step with him. There are no gladder companies than gather in the conventions of Christian young people—feasts with Christ. Prof. Henry Van Dyke has set to music recently discovered words attributed to Christ:

I, the peace that passeth knowledge dwell amid the daily strife;
I, the bread of heaven, am broken in the sacrament of life.

We may always have Jesus at our feasts if we desire his presence, and take care not to have anything there to offend him. I read of a little girl who heard her pastor say in church that the Lord would come and be a guest in any home where they welcomed him. She remembered that every day her father said, "Be present at our table, Lord," and so that day she set a chair for the guest at the table. Just as they were sitting down a poor man came to the door and asked for food, and the little girl brought him in, saying, joyfully, "See, father, the Lord Jesus could not come himself, so he sent this poor man in his place." These are the two ways in which we may have Jesus for our guest.

Religion brings gladness, or at least peace into our sorrows, as is illustrated by a very sad wedding story of modern times. Anna Steele was one of the sweetest of our hymn writers. From childhood she was an invalid, and at times a great sufferer. When she was twenty-one, the young man to whom she was devotedly attached was drowned the day before the one appointed for their wedding. But she did not despair. She took counsel of the Christ in her, and sung that song of strong submission:

Father, whate'er of earthly bliss
Thy sovereign will denies,
Accepted at thy throne of grace,
Let this petition rise:

Give me a calm, a thankful heart,
From every murmur free;
The blessings of thy grace impart,
And make me live to thee.

Let us not forget that as the mother of Jesus was, next to himself, the chief joy-bringer in that feast at Cana, so a Christian mother is to-day next to Christ among the blessings of life. An editor says: "We have received a dainty little note written in the small, somewhat cramped hand of a nine-year-old little woman, who writes us to know if a capital should not be used when writing the word 'mother.' The dear little girl unconsciously expresses preference, and her reverent love by writing the word 'mother' with a capital in her own letter. The little philosopher tells us of her interview with her teacher and several others on this subject, but fails to see why 'the dear, darling, precious mamma should not be spelled with a capital as well as the mayor or the governor.'" In any case, a good mother is capital in the best sense.

Lord, with what care hast Thou begirt us round!
Parents first season us, then schoolmasters
Deliver us to laws; they send us bound
To rules of reason, holy messengers,

Pulpits and sundayes, sorrow dogging sinne
Afflictions sorted, anguish of all sizes
Fine nets and stratagems to catch us in,
Bibles laid open, millions of surprises,

Blessings beforehand, tyes of gratefulnesse
The sound of glorie ringing in our eares
Without, our shame; within, our consciences
Angels and grace, eternall hopes and fears

Yet all these fences and their whole array
One cunning bosome-sinne blows quite away.
GEORGE HERBERT.

That no such sin may steal our joys, let us go only where we can keep step with Him.

The Nation's Ideal

ON the threshold of a new and important stage in our Administrative history, it is eminently appropriate that the highest hopes and aspirations of the nation should find expression through some channel which would convey to the whole people, from the President down to the humblest citizen, the national ideal. This has been accomplished in the remarkable Symposium which appears in another part of this issue. As in the past, so now the enlightened, patriotic, Christian element, represented by the leading men and women of our land, have once more chosen THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as the medium through which their most earnest desire for the moral and material welfare of the Republic may be communicated to the world. In doing this, and in setting forth very frankly those things that are most to be desired by the American people during the coming four years of President Roosevelt's Administration, the distinguished contributors to the Symposium render a valuable public service.

What a wide range of magnificent opportunities is here presented as practically within the nation's reach. To transform the ideal into the real, to make these much-to-be-desired reforms actually come to pass, demands courage, energy, an equal regard for all persons or classes, rich or poor, and a heart full of the love of justice, yet awake to sympathy. The Executive who studies how best to promote the welfare of the common people—who, as Lincoln said, are "the most of folks"—by legitimate and constitutional methods, will be assured of a high place in national esteem.

Here are the ten leading suggestions which the contributors to the Symposium regard as the "most desirable" things:

1. Universal Arbitration and the World's Peace.
2. Increased Official Integrity and Punishment for Corruptionists.
3. Solve the Saloon Problem.
4. Finish the Panama Canal.
5. A Higher Standard of Administrative Morality.
6. Simplify and Improve the Civil Service.
7. Improved Relations Between Labor and Capital.
8. Control of the Corporations.
9. Stamp Out Election Bribery.
10. Increased Respect for Law and Order.

Other suggestions include these: Solve the Race Problem; Pacify the Philippines; Build a Pan-American Railroad; Improve our Foreign Relations; Better Educational Facilities; Justice for the Indians; Restore our Merchant Marine; Improve our Postal System; Better Municipal Rule; Closer Union of Rich and Poor; Economy in National Finances; National Insurance Supervision; The North and South Knit Closer, and Tariff Revision. One contributor sighs for a return to early social ideals; another thinks the "Simple Life," socially and politically, the highest good; a third believes we should strive after national righteousness more earnestly, and still another considers that the one thing most urgently needed is a great revival, which will bring the whole nation into the Kingdom and make it a means of converting the world.

It will possibly surprise those who have believed the American people to be dominated by the military spirit, to note that in these contributions, which are neither sectional, factional nor political, but represent the inmost thought of our most typical American men and women, peace has a preponderance of advocates over any other measure in the proportion of three to one. This would seem to go very far toward demonstrating that the highest hope cherished in the hearts of the enlightened Christian people of this country to-day, is that the world's peace may be advanced by the attitude and policy of our government during the next four years.

We must leave to our readers, however, the pleasant and profitable duty of drawing their own conclusions concerning the Symposium as a whole. Its enumeration of ends desired to be attained is by no means an impracticable one, and we believe that there is not a single suggestion the realization of which would not contribute, in some degree, to the happiness and prosperity of our people.

The United States has taken its place among the foremost nations, and to us the eyes of the world are now turned in hope and expectation. We need to convince the nations that righteousness and justice are the sheet anchor and helm of the Republic. To do this, we must keep constantly in view the highest ideals. Many of these are presented in the letters we print to-day. We commend their thoughtful consideration to the whole people, in the hope that statesman and private citizen alike may read therein the "signs of the times."

Criminal Responsibility

ONE of the most remarkable of recent scientific utterances, is that of Dr. Edward A. Spitzka, of Columbia University, who has been making an address before a scientific association in Philadelphia. He insists that all the talk about "criminal brains" is erroneous. It is not, he declares, founded on fact, and is disproved by scientific observation. The brains of ten men eminent, respectively, in science, in philosophy, in philanthropy, and in the business world, had been compared with the brains of ten criminals, many of them murderers, and it had been found that there was little, if any, difference between them. "The study of criminals anatomically and physically," he continued, "does not tend to establish a criminal type, nor to describe crime as an equivalent to infanticism, epilepsy or atavism. Many criminals show not a single anomaly in their physical or mental make-up. Many persons that do show marked anomaly in physical and mental make-up, never showed any tendency to crime."

This statement, it will be seen, shifts the responsibility for crime to the criminal himself, and to his association and environment. It can no longer be possible for him to plead that there was a physical predisposition toward some particular crime, and that he could not escape his fate. Unhappily, there are many criminals who have been made such by early training and association. They were born in a polluted moral atmosphere, and their early years were passed among people who had lost their sense of moral obligations. Society must share in the responsibility for the evil deeds of such criminals; but it is a relief to know that the evil taint does not go further back than environment. As the ancient philosopher said, "This have I found, that God hath made man upright." It is also an encouragement to all who are trying to reform the criminal. They must realize that there is no physical reason why the man should not be reformed, if he can be led to seek the means of reformation that God provides.

Labor's Social Status

TIMELY protest against the growing disposition to despise the laborer, is made by Dr. Bristol, in the sermon published this week, on another page of this journal. In this day, the protest is needed. We shall be false to our national ideals, untrue to our national principles, if we ever come to divide our society into classes, putting the rich idler at the top, and the workingman at the bottom. There is naturally a tendency in that direction, owing to the fact that what we call "the labor-market" is overstocked. There are more workingmen, at least in the cities, than can be employed. There are trades in which men ask for work as if they were asking a favor. The employer can pick and choose, and when those are the conditions, we are not far from the situation in which the workingman is held in low esteem. But the tendency, ought to be resisted, especially in a Republic. It is by labor that our wealth and our commercial pre-eminence is built up. If it were conceivable that every workingman struck work at a given time, our national superiority would crumble to pieces. The whole company of millionaires could do nothing to save us. It is the laboring man who produces our wealth, and on social and economic grounds alone, we owe him our respect.

In the church especially, we ought never to treat him with disdain. As Dr. Bristol points out, there is a standing reason for honoring him, in the fact that the Founder of the Church was a Workingman. Besides this, the principles of Christianity are utterly antagonistic to any class distinction which disparages him. A prominent preacher recently called attention to the fact, that the only class distinction which Christ recognized was represented by a vertical line, while the society of his time used a horizontal line. Men talked then, as they do now, of the upper and the lower classes. By Christ, men were not so divided. His line was vertical, separating the good from the bad. On both sides of that line were the rich and the poor. The fact of a man being wealthy, did not necessarily make him bad or good; the fact of a man being poor did not affect his position. The only thing that counted with him was character. His money, or lack of it was merely an accessory.

The rich man, with the gold ring and fine clothes, whom James saw, being invited to sit in a good place in church, while the poor man was told to "stand there," or sit under a footstool, stirred his indignation. "Ye ought not so to do," he told the Christian people of that day. He might find occasion to repeat his reproof if he came among us. We are glad to see that Dr. Bristol has taken up the subject, and has so emphatically declared that the church which disparages or despises workingmen, does not deserve to be known as belonging to Him, who was known by his contemporaries as "The Carpenter."

Some Secrets of Youth

FROM very early days in the world's history, people have earnestly longed to be young. The one conqueror who wins his battle in the end is Time. Though his advances are so slow as to be almost imperceptible, in the course of years he changes brown hair to silver, writes lines on smooth brows, and hollows rounded cheeks. Let a woman, or a man, cling ever so strenuously to the outward and visible form of youth, age will come at last.

But age need not come so soon as it once did. In Eastern lands, where women mature early, they are old and withered before thirty-five has been reached. A woman to-day, in good health and good looks, at fifty-four, is as youthful in appearance as her mother was at forty, and her grandmother at a decade earlier than that. Our greater luxury of living, our higher rate of health, and the comparative ease of housekeeping, notwithstanding some drawbacks, have combined to keep us young. Time will win at last, but he will not win soon.

A happy and contented heart has much to do with the preservation of youth. She who is morbid, envious and ill-tempered; she who frets over small disappointments, and takes the pressure of daily care as if it were a grinding burden, will grow old rapidly.

A temper that constantly and confidently refers everything to God and accepts his will with cheerful acquiescence, will aid in keeping its possessor young.

Calm me, my God, and keep me calm,
Let thine outstretched wing
Be like the shade of Elim's palm
Beside her desert spring.

Yes, keep me calm, though loud and rude
The sounds my ear that greet;
Calm in the closet's solitude,
Calm in the bustling street.

A cheerful expectation of pleasant things to happen is another spell that defies Time. Just around the corner, just at the turn of the road, waits for you and me, not a sorrow, not a fit of illness, not a foe, but a new friend, a bit of good fortune, a return of health, a bright-faced joy. Think thus of life and you will not grow old fast.

And don't mind it a bit if you do grow old. Every stage of life has its beautiful aspects. Plain women in youth are often handsome in old age. There is wonderful beauty in snow-white hair, if it frame a face that is the mirror of an exquisite soul.

Fills a Long-Felt Want

Your book, Family Worship for Every Day in the Year, was received yesterday. To say I am pleased is expressing it very mildly. I think it is a superb work. It exactly fills a long felt want. It is a book that ought to have a place in every home.

Crisis in Morocco

NEW trouble has developed in Morocco through an order issued by the Sultan, directing all foreigners to quit the city of Fez. The order, it is believed, was aimed especially at France, as it was accompanied by the dismissal of several Frenchmen who were in the Sultan's service. An open insult to the French government was given, by the Sultan peremptorily refusing to receive the French Minister at Tangier, when he demanded an audience to protest against the ill-usage of the French Consul at Fez. It is difficult to understand a great Power tamely submitting to such treatment, and a war is now confidently expected. The difficulty consists in the anarchy existing in Morocco. If France went to war with the Sultan, the conflict would be costly both in life and money, and the benefit would be doubtful. It would probably involve an outbreak in Algeria, where there is a growing disposition to take the first opportunity to throw off the French yoke. The fact of Morocco having insulted France with impunity, would be equally dangerous to French prestige in Algeria, so that both war and peace have their dangers. The Sultan would unquestionably have the support of the Moors in a war with a European power. Though they resist his authority, they hate the French with such intensity, that they would gladly rally to the standard of any leader who would take up arms against them. Indeed, one of the worst grievances that the Moors have against the Sultan, is that he is favorable to foreigners, especially to the French. One of his brothers has recently been making capital with the Moors, by professing his animosity against the foreigner. Raisuli, too, the brigand chief who held Mr. Perdicaris for ransom, is also a power to be reckoned with. The Sultan is evidently afraid of him, and dreads his being able to combine the opposing forces against him. The situation is one of grave concern both from internal anarchy and foreign complications. The country is rich, and might be prosperous, but through long misgovernment it is in hopeless straits, as was the land described by the ancient prophet:

Judgment is turned away backward and justice standeth afar off: for truth is fallen in the street and equity cannot enter; yea truth faileth and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey (Isa. 59: 14-15).

ANCIENT GATE IN THE MARKET-PLACE OF TANGIER, MOROCCO

Lured into Slavery

A wretched woebegone man arrived in Cincinnati, O., a few days ago, and asked help to reach New York City. He said he had just come from West Virginia, where he had been held in durance. His story was that he had applied to an employment agency in New York, which engaged him to work in the mines of West Virginia. They promised him good wages and fair treatment. The man said he accepted the offer and was furnished with a railroad pass to the neighborhood of the mines. On his arrival he was set to work under an armed guard. His supply of food was meagre and in bad condition. His account of the treatment he received and of the work he was required to do, indicates that he was regarded as a slave. At the risk of his life he made his escape, and after undergoing fearful hardships in crossing the mountains he reached Cincinnati, and was furnished with funds to reach home. He declared that he would prosecute the agency in New York which had deceived him. If his story is true, he is entitled to our cordial sympathy. But how many there are who are serving as willing slaves to a worse taskmaster, who defrauds them in life and robs them of their souls.

That they may recover themselves out of the snares of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will (II. Timothy 2: 26).

Selling Her Doll

A newspaper in Omaha, Neb., recently published a pathetic advertisement couched in childish language. It announced that a little girl wanted to sell her doll for money to buy necessaries. The advertisement attracted immediate attention. It was learned that it was inserted in the paper by an eight-year-old girl, without the knowledge of her mother, who is a widow, bedridden by illness, and in extremely destitute circumstances. The child, grieving over her mother's sickness and destitution, had resolved to sacrifice her only doll, to which she was devotedly attached, in order to get money to buy comfortable clothes for her mother. Charitable people in the city were touched by the pathetic offer, and took care that the child should not lose her doll. Money and clothing were sent to her in abundance, and mother and child were made comfortable. As often happens in life, when the mind is ready for sacrifice, the sacrifice is not required. The disposition to give all up for a good cause counts for the act.

Because thou hast done this thing, and has not withheld thy son, thine only son; in blessing I will bless thee (Gen. 22:16, 17).

Fourteen Years in Prison

Two ladies have been filled with joy by the unexpected news that a man who is the son of one and the brother of the other, whom they had long mourned as dead, is alive and well. It appears that fourteen years ago, he was sent by a New York firm to Colombia, to complete a contract for his employers. He did his work and was preparing to return, when a revolution broke out, and for some time he was in peril of his life. Eventually he was spared from execution, but was committed to prison, where he was kept in close confinement for fourteen years. He was not allowed to communicate with his family, or to hold any communication with the outside world. He had been in his youth an expert blacksmith, and the Colombian authorities turned his knowledge of the trade to account. From all parts of the Republic difficult work was sent to the prison, to be done by the mysterious prisoner whose identity was kept carefully concealed. Recently, by one of the common turns of the tide in Colombian affairs, he was released, and lost no time in writing home. During his imprisonment his wife and his father and his two brothers had died, but his aged mother and his sister are still living to welcome him. How many there are whose absence is deplored by those who love them, who are held captive by a more cruel tyrant; who might return if they would only appeal to Him who is mighty to deliver.

They overcome him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of the testimony (Rev. 12: 11).

Doubling the Food Supply

An article in the current number of the International Quarterly should set at rest the anxiety about the capacity of the earth to support its inhabitants. Pessimists have been telling us for some time past, that the time would come when the increase of population would be greater than could be supported by the food that could be produced. The prospect before us was consequently that of starvation for the poorer part of the human race. Prof. N. S. Shaler, of Harvard, the author of the article, shows that we have not nearly reached the limit of the earth's productive powers, and that in fact double the quantity of food now produced can be grown through the application of scientific principles. An immense area now unproductive, he says, may be won by means of engineering and other scientific work, as in irrigating arid fields or draining those which are excessively watered, or by improving the methods of fertilizing soils now in use. It is impossible, with the present lack of information, to determine accurately how extensive is the field which may be won to tillage by the work of the engineer. This winning from the excessively arid lands will be done by irrigation, and from the morasses, the fresh water swamps and the marine marshes, by drainage. In this country alone, 100,000 square miles might be added to the producing area by drainage, and a much larger area of land now arid, by irrigation. In India and in large districts in Africa, the same work might be done. In all, Mr. Shaler believes that the earth, if properly tilled, might be made to support three times the population now existing. Thus the Creator has endowed the earth with plentiful provision which, as need arises, he gives man the ingenuity to bring forth. If in gratitude to him men would only serve him, the benediction of the Psalmist would be fulfilled.

Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us (Ps. 67: 6).

May it Enter Many Homes

The Red Letter Bible came safe to hand. It was so well packed it was not marred in the least. I find it more than I had anticipated. The type is so clear it invites you to perusal; its size is easy to handle, which makes it convenient for general use. May it enter many homes, and be the means of salvation to many souls.

THE HEART OF THE WORLD

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF OPENING CHAPTERS

Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., of the aristocratic St. Cecilia Metropolitan Church, is a pastor with broad humanitarian views of life. He has found time amid the duties of his ministry to write a book, entitled, The Christian Socialist, which has just been published under the nom de plume of "Mark Burns." It excites a tremendous sensation. His secret of the authorship is known only to Miss Mildred Rodney, his betrothed, who has divined it. The book excites mingled praise and antagonism, and is the topic of the hour. The conservative element denounce it as dangerous to society. Judge Rodney is especially bitter. Next winter, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton is chosen as bishop. A distinguished audience assembles in St. Cecilia's, to witness the consecration. At the critical moment, the pastor makes an open avowal of the authorship of the offending book. Bishops, clerics, and audience are stricken dumb with amazement. His ecclesiastical career is regarded as ended. Miss Rodney, notwithstanding some parental opposition, consents to marry Stanton, and the two begin to face the world together bravely.

Meanwhile, a great strike is going on at Lenox, and Stanton is invited to address the Union men, by Bruce Harvey, their president. He advocates Christian love and forbearance, instead of violence, but the meeting is stampeded by the news of a riot at the mills. Stanton and Harvey go there with the crowd, but cannot preserve order. In the riot several are killed and many injured. Stanton rescues a poor negro worker from the furious mob, but is himself badly hurt in doing so. He and Harvey become fast friends. Harwood, and Wrightam are two millionaire mill-owners, whose hard and oppressive measures have embittered the workers. Stanton resolves to plead with them for a better understanding, as both are church members and professing Christians. He calls on Wrightam, but meets with a decided rebuff. With Harwood he has more success, and the two become good friends. Harwood has a great domestic sorrow, which takes the sweetness out of all his business triumphs. He leaves his wealthy home and friends, and disguised, goes to work as a mill-hand.

Stanton meanwhile is becoming well known as an advocate of Christian Socialism, and is a frequent lecturer. He meets many queer characters among the workers, and much appreciation. The troubles at Lenox continue, and he arrives there one day just in time to find a mob about to burn a negro who is accused of murder. Stanton determines to thwart the lynchers, but is knocked senseless, and the negro is burned. Next day the real culprits are found, and the negro victim is shown to have been wholly innocent. There is a popular revulsion of feeling in favor of Stanton. On the following Sunday he preaches in one of the leading pulpits, by invitation, and takes the lynching for his topic. Some people in the audience take exception to certain remarks by the speaker, as unpatriotic, and there is a momentary interruption, during which many leave the hall. Stanton then quietly resumes his discourse.

"ANYTHING which helps to destroy the right use of the Sabbath is an enemy of human progress. The commercial greed which uses this day like other days, to make money, is a greed which deserves and gets the severe condemnation of God. There is an institution in this State which boasts of its rapid commercial progress. Its machinery grinds on, day and night and Sundays, without cessation. The citizens of that town point with pride at the wonderful enterprise and power of the plant. They like to tell you how many hands are employed; how much money they spend in the town; what a great thing it is for the State. Who raises his voice against the insatiable greed which robs God of his righteous day for rest, worship and service? No one but the few faithful preachers of the town, and many of the active business men call them cranks for uttering their protest. The desecration of the Sabbath by men and women who cannot get pleasure enough out of six days, but must have seven, means the unnecessary employment of thousands of other people in theatres, livery-stables, railroads, in places of amusement and dissipation. The great labor organizations, many of them, use the day, or a large part of it, for their social and business meetings. The Day of the Lord is trampled on contemptuously or carelessly by the multitude who come up to its holy opportunity without either reverence or earnest purpose. Christian Socialism declares with strong emphasis its belief in the right use of one day in seven for three things—rest, worship and service. Any habit which interrupts these three uses of the Sabbath, is contrary to the teachings of Jesus, and is one of the causes for the unhappiness and loss of men in every part of the world's energy.

"Together with its faith in the ultimate fashioning power of the Church and its teachings, Christian Socialism believes and teaches the great value and necessity of missionary energy to help bring about a better social order among men.

"Here, again, is where some of our socialistic friends will put on their hats and go out. Missions! forsooth! a feeble and feminine little adjunct to the Church and prayer-meeting! But what is the object of Christian Socialism? Not simply to improve social conditions in my little trades union; not simply to bring about better conditions in my own home, or my own town and State, but everywhere around the world, and among all sorts and conditions of men. The whole social order needs the leaven of Christ. China needs it as well as Germany and America. India and Africa and Japan need life abundantly, and that is the only true Socialism which takes account in its programme of all the nations of the earth. It has never occurred to the average man of labor to reckon up the tremendous debt which civilization owes the missionary, both home and foreign. It is worth while to note what the President of the United States has recently said about missions. No wiser or truer statements have ever fallen from his lips. He said, 'It is such missionary work that prevents the pioneers from sinking perilously near the level of the savagery against which they contend. Without it, the conquest of this continent would have had little but an animal side. Because of it, deep beneath and through the national character, there runs that power of firm adherence to a lofty ideal, upon which the safety of the nation will ultimately depend.'

"I would to God those three profound sentences could be engraved in tablets, and put up in every schoolroom, church, factory and mercantile house in the country. Sneer at missions! The missionary of the Cross has been worth more to America than all the money-seekers or politicians in its history.

"Commenting on these remarkable utterances of President Roosevelt, The Outlook, of last August, said: 'That this is a sound view, no one who has studied historically the forces which have produced the United States, can deny. The home missionary, who to many people is hardly more than a man with a wife and several children, somewhere out West, to whom a barrelful of odds and ends is sent, and from whom is received a letter full of gratitude and accounts of prayer-meetings, is in reality one of the most dominant agents in the making of history that the world has ever known. Compared with the settlement and civilization of Europe, the spread of civilization over the territory which now comprises the United States, has been startling in its swiftness. No armies ever achieved so thorough or so speedy a triumph as the American pioneers did. And among the pioneers none were more courageous, none more steadfast, and none more in earnest, or, on the whole, more successful in attaining their purposes, than the men who went, not for the sake of extracting wealth from the soil, but for the sake of establishing righteousness in the new communities. In the midst of greed, or what, at best, may be called the spirit of acquisitiveness, they injected the spirit which seeks not to get but to give, the saving spirit of service, the leaven of the nation.'

"That is not religious fanaticism or sentiment; it is historical fact. The same thing is true of the foreign missionary. Wherever the Cross of Jesus has gone, borne by sincere and consecrated hands, there has gone healing and power. The largest medical institution in the world is in India, put there by a modest young surgeon, whose name, probably not one member of a trades-union in America ever heard of. Yet this mission, only one out of thousands of beneficent institutions planted by the missionary boards, had done more to help solve the difficult social and political conditions of that part of India, than anything the British Government has ever been able to do. The debt of England and America to the foreign missionaries for the work which they have done to open a new and hostile territory to commerce alone, is a debt which neither nation can compute in terms of money. The great debt the world owes to the missionary everywhere, is the debt which must always be owed to those unselfish men and women, who, without noise and without praise, give their lives to lift up fallen races, and bring the Christ of God into a depth of misery, want, injustice and torture, of which the American laborer knows nothing. Christian Socialism is obliged to note the fact of the necessity for this socializing influence of the missionary of the Cross, and it puts in a foremost place in its platform, a profound belief in this agency for establishing a Christian order among all the children of men.

"So Christian Socialism declares as one of its greatest beliefs its faith in the Christian family as the centre of the real lasting life of a happy, useful humanity. In other words, the Christian home is the greatest institution in the Republic, and around it revolve the greatest destinies, and can be found the greatest shaping forces of the future of the State.

"Christian Socialism resents with horror any social teaching which treats the marriage relation with lightness or contempt. It declares the doctrine of the New Testament as to one wife, and the teaching of Jesus on the matter of divorce, accepting only one condition as permitting a lawful separation from one person and marriage to another. A God-fearing, God-loving, sacred relationship, a family altar, an obedient, truthful upbringing of children, a motherhood hallowed by simple domestic joys and service, a fatherhood ennobled by participation in children's plays, and sympathetic with their ambitions, a home circle which is a genuine centre of civic righteousness and Church and national love; this is fundamental to any permanent social democracy. Any attempt to establish a community life which ignores or despises the individual Christian family, is an attempt which will inevitably result in disaster. The Republic can never be rightly socialized until the family is rightly Christianized.

"This, in brief outline, is the programme of Christian Socialism. It is nothing more nor less than the putting of Jesus' teaching into practice in every-day life. It is simply the attempt to do all things to the glory of God. It is the assertion in practical terms of the Bible teaching that the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof. It is man's part in the answer to the prayer Jesus taught his disciples to pray, 'Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.'

"It is true, this kind of Socialism depends, first of all, upon a regenerated humanity; 'Seek ye first the Kingdom of God,' is the first sentence at the head of the Christian Socialism programme. This is what makes it distinct from all those social programmes which place first, either legislation or political and commercial supremacy. Above and under and through all the Christian Socialist's efforts to make a better physical condition for the race, is the vision of the Kingdom of God, in the individual soul of man, acting as leaven on his surroundings, socializing them with the same divine purpose and power: 'Man shall not live by bread alone,' is also a statement fundamental in the Christian Socialist's creed, together with Jesus' other statements. 'A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things that he possesseth,' and 'What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world and forfeit his life?'

"It is hardly necessary to add that in the carrying out of this programme, the Christian Socialist depends upon the quiet, continuous, loving forces which are at work already in the world. Education of the people, enlightenment of human reason and judgment through all the avenues of the Church, the school, the press, the labor organizations, the home, the platform, the magazine, the debate, the formation of public opinion in all peaceful ways. In addition to all this, Christian Socialism expects to receive most of its inspiration and its progress from the divine source of the Holy Spirit, who, according to the promise, is in the world on purpose to take the things of Christ and show them unto us. To carry out a definite programme for the establishment of a better, happier, social order, and take no account of the power of the Holy Spirit, is as impossible for Christian Socialism, as it would be impossible to expect a steam-engine to go without lighting a fire under the boiler to make steam. The divine purpose and power are constantly taken into the account by the Christian. 'Not by might, nor by power; but by my spirit, saith the Lord,' is the humble reliance the Christian Socialist places in that strength which is more than human. By which alone man shall be able to realize any degree of an ideal human society.

"Christian Socialism has no place in its programme for hatred of one class for another; it contains no place for race prejudice, or for a double standard of conduct; it has no room for machine methods in politics nor for narrow sectarianism in religion; it entertains no false visions of a social brotherhood built up by force or legislation in a day; it sees clearly the slow moving, but certain growth of the Kingdom of God in the world, the leavening and shaping factors of divine light and life. It has its ideal, as it should have, but it is not impracticably visionary of results. With a majesty which will not be falsely forced, and a serenity which never has been superficially flustered, with an energy which is not stolidity, the Kingdom of God is being established among the children of men. The final achievement may be to our human impatience unreasonably delayed; but in the end righteousness shall prevail, and the Brotherhood shall be established on earth, as it is in heaven, even as God wants it to be, and as Jesus taught us it might be, if we obeyed his commandments, and lived according to his teachings."

It was late when Stanton finished his address, and he did not expect any large number in the audience would remain to the after conference. To his astonishment, scarcely a hundred people went away. For more than an hour longer, question and answer followed fast on each other. Even when the chairman of the League closed the conference, because it was within a few minutes of midnight, groups of men gathered about Stanton, eagerly discussing his position, and raining questions upon him. The city papers commenting on the address and the meeting, while taking exception to many of Stanton's views, acknowledged frankly that the subject was evidently one of great public interest, and that it could not be ignored, nor sneered into oblivion.

"A WORKMAN RAN OUT AND FLUNG HIMSELF ON THE DAZED FIGURE OF THE LABOR LEADER"

The chairman of the League walked along with Stanton to his hotel, congratulating him on the success of the evening. Stanton, with a modesty which was his usual attitude, attributed whatever was a success to the public interest in the subject.

"By the way, that man who made the interruption, do you know him?" Stanton took the man's card out and looked at it as they paused at the hotel entrance, reading the name aloud, "James R. Mansfield, 1012 Prairie Avenue."

The chairman shook his head. "Never heard of him. Shall you call on him?"

"Yes, I think so. I do not leave the city till to-morrow evening."

They shook hands and said good-night. Stanton pondering over his experience at the Auditorium, and feeling the natural reaction from the tension he had been under for several hours.

In the morning he called at 1012 Prairie Avenue, and in reply to his question if Mr. Mansfield was at home, was informed by the servant that he was, and invited to come in. He was ushered into a large, handsomely furnished parlor, and had hardly seated himself, when the owner of the house came in.

As Stanton rose to meet the man, he noticed a momentary gleam of astonishment in his eyes, but his greeting was outwardly civil enough.

"Mr. Stanton, I hardly expected you would take the trouble, sir, to come out here, after what happened last night."

"I took you at your word, brother, and I am here. I hardly know why, but it struck me you went away last night, because you did not understand my position, not because you really disagreed with me."

"I disagreed with you, because I believe your theories are all wrong."

"I did not come to argue with you, brother," said Stanton, quietly. "But I had an idea that you misunderstood my definitions and my position, generally."

"I think not," replied Mansfield a little stiffly. "If I understand you as I think I do, your position on the question of property, for example, is like this."

He went on to give an absolutely false construction to Stanton's teachings in the matter of property and private ownership. Stanton listened quietly, but it took all his remarkable self-control to maintain his composure. Mansfield grew excited more and more, as he walked up and down, striking out vigorously at the man-of-straw bogie he had constructed out of his own misconception of Stanton's words and teaching. Even when Stanton, in a brief interval, during which Mansfield paused to take breath, attempted to set him right, he stamped up and down and refused to listen, charging Stanton with all kinds of absurd teaching, and confounding the words socialism, anarchy, communism, free love, and utopianism with an astonishing display of ignorance, which finally impressed Stanton with such force, that his sense of humor came to his relief, and he sat still, listening to Mansfield's tirade, smiling inwardly at its absurdity, and pitying the man for his complete lack of reason and judgment in spite of his apparent intelligence.

When at last there was a pause, after Mansfield had exhausted his rhetoric in a particularly absurd challenge to Stanton to deny a statement Stanton had never made, the latter rose, and quietly said, "Mr. Mansfield, I do not think it is possible for me to change your opinion of my teaching. All I wish to say is this: you have entirely misunderstood my book, from which you quoted several times, each time incorrectly, and you have defined terms for me which I have never made."

Mr. James R. Mansfield stared at Stanton, and an angry red spot began to glow on each cheek. Stanton walked toward the door.

"I don't see what you called for," said Mansfield savagely.

"I don't either, brother," replied Stanton with a smile. "I am very sorry you don't understand me; but I am sure it is quite useless for me to try to explain."

The man looked at him sourly for a moment, and then laughed, "you're like all the anarchists, unreasonable, and get mad over an argument!"

Stanton gravely bowed and went out, pondering the rest of the day, as he went about the city, over the strange perversity and stupidity of some kinds of humanity.

Going home on the evening train, he met one of his old parishioners, a man in full sympathy with his teaching and purpose. In conversation and in answer to questions about the Auditorium meeting, Stanton mentioned Mansfield's name, and related the incident of the interruption.

"James R. Mansfield?"

"Yes, he lives out on Prairie Avenue."

"I know him. He is an idle fellow; never did a stroke of honest labor in his life. Lives on the money his father made in real estate deals after the big fire."

"But doesn't it astonish you?" asked Stanton, "that this man, with all his intelligence and education, should so absolutely misunderstand the plain definitions and statements I made? Am I so obscure in my doctrine that men of Mansfield's calibre cannot grasp the meaning?"

"My dear friend," said Stanton's parishioner with a smile, "do you realize that there is a host of people in this civilized world yet, who do not or will not grasp an idea that is foreign to their life habits of thought? James R. Mansfield is simply a type of the kind of men you are destined to meet all over this country, men who refuse to allow new ideas or definitions to percolate into their brains. Even when you prove to such people that anarchy and socialism are opposite ideas, they will listen, and then say, 'O well, for all practical purposes they are just the same!' What can you do with such people?"

"Give them over to the tender mercies of the Lord," replied Stanton with a sigh.

"Yet some of these newspaper men are just as bad," continued his friend, taking up a copy of an evening paper containing an account of the meeting at the Auditorium.

There was a fairly accurate account of the meeting itself, and a number of extracts from Stanton's address. But in an editorial, his address was attacked and ridiculed from the standpoint of the editor, as he perverted Stanton's actual views, not as Stanton had clearly and plainly expressed himself. To any one who had not heard Stanton, the editorial was a profound and deserving rebuke for a visionary and dangerous social doctrine. But it was Manfield's bogie, set up and bravely knocked down. The address as a whole, was not analyzed. The main thought in it was contemptuously ignored, and the editor's own perversion of socialism, entirely divorced from Christian teaching, was substituted.

The whole distortion of the truth stung Stanton deeply. It was a cowardly way of trying to throw the reading public off the track. Together with the incident of Mansfield's protest, it added to his fear that the people were not yet ready for his doctrine. The question Mildred had raised haunted him: "Do you think the people will listen to you?" He recalled his answer, "Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel, this message of a social Christ to men, whether they are ready for it or not." And as he drew near home, his great, gentle spirit grew calmer. "If the thing is of God," he said to himself, "man cannot prevail against it. Not all the stupid, stubborn Mansfields and editorials can down the sure rising of the Truth."

He passed a few days in Lenox before going out to his next engagement, and he spent a part of the time at the mills, getting educational facts to use concerning machinery, hours of labor, danger to workmen, etc. In passing through the casting-room, he was surprised to see Harvey standing by the "Octopus" talking to the foreman. He was very much excited, and the foreman seemed angry at Harvey's presence.

As Stanton was moving slowly along, passing into the brass foundry room, an exclamation from Harvey drew his attention again to the two men. He thought the foreman threw up his arms as if to strike the labor leader. Harvey stepped back, his dark face blacker still with passion, and at that moment one of the derrick arms of the "Octopus" swung round with its usual load of white, hot metal. There was a hoarse cry from the man up aloft, who pulled at two or three levers frantically. Something had gone wrong somewhere. Whatever it was, Harvey stood in great peril. The foreman snatched at him, missed his sleeve, and jumped back. To Stanton, watching the whole thing in a horrified nightmare, powerless to do anything, events merged one into another with definite but startling rapidity. A workman ran out from under the scorching fist of the derrick arm, and shielding his eyes from the blinding glare, flung himself on the dazed figure of the labor leader, just as the remorseless arm broke from the chain and swirled over, dragging its connections in a confused tangle over the spot where Harvey and the workman had fallen together. There was a second's gleam of recognition as the blue-white flame swept the actors in the little tragedy into more than limelight distinctness, and Stanton was conscious that the workman who had run up to Harvey was Harwood, the mill owner. As the machinery came to a stop, and men paused a second before the possible sight under the broken "Octopus," Stanton's prayer went up to God the Father for all his suffering children.

IN THE OFFICE OF THE PRISON-GATE MISSION, NEW YORK

The Prison-Gate Mission's Work

ALTHOUGH the Prison-Gate Mission has only lately opened its modest headquarters at No. 192 Elm Street, New York, it is already becoming a centre of interest and a beacon of hope to ex-prisoners who are desirous of forsaking criminal ways and making a sincere effort, with divine help, to lead honest lives.

Chaplain Munro, who is in charge of the Mission, says:

"We help men to help themselves, in finding them employment. The devil finds plenty of trouble for the idler. We have a free labor bureau, and there are Christian men who are ready each to take some ex-prisoner and direct his future life. This is a matter of real Cross-bearing for Christ's sake. We keep a record of each case.

"One day recently, four released men called on us for positions. They assured me that they had been compelled to go back to crime, as nobody would employ them. This is doubtless true.

"One man, M. S——, who called at the Mission, had been recently liberated. We found a home for him in the country with a Christian friend, who was willing to direct his future, as a Cross-bearer. We have already had good reports of him. He is going forward slowly toward a better life. His winter clothing was scanty, so we got an overcoat for him. We have the promise of permanent employment for him in the near future, if he continues to hold on as he has begun. Since the grace of God and human sympathy have come into his life he seems to be a changed man.

"C. L——, a young man under twenty-five years, came to us a few days ago. He asked for a chance to become a better man. He comes from a good family, and means, by God's help, to live a new life. He has been helped by the Mission.

"John H—— was released some time ago. He walked the streets for nearly two months, but could find no employment. We took up his case, and found him a job, and he is still working, and his employer speaks well of him. He is sober, faithful, and industrious."

Any inquiries by persons interested in this Samaritan work, addressed to the Superintendent, 192 Elm Street, New York, will be fully answered.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

My Song

"I know in my soul that my God answers prayer."

I AM told it is vain now to seek the old way
Of the prophets and saints and the martyrs of yore;
For the Book that they took as their counsel and stay
Was of legends and myths of the Hebrews a store;
But I drink from my cup of the old-fashioned ware,
For I know in my soul that my God answers prayer.

Yes, my God answers prayer, and their Book so attests,
Or I ne'er could have known that the wail of the soul—
Like the cry of the babe to the heart where it nests—
Would be heard in the realm of the pure and the whole:
But that Book bade me hope, and it led me to dare:
So I know in my soul that my God answers prayer.

But the men of the schools, with their "physics" and "rays"—
I am told that they find in the world there is place
For the "ions" and "ohms," and the "ergs,"—but no ways
For the "Power" above to hear prayer and show grace:
So I here, with the voice of my consciousness swear,
That I know in my soul that my God answers prayer.

S. H. PLATT.

Springfield, Mass.

E. R. G. M. "I want to acknowledge the goodness and faithfulness of my Heavenly Father in answering prayer. I know he has answered my petitions many times."

Mrs. R. K. G. "I want to add my name to the list, as I have had my prayers answered a great many times; and I know, when we trust God and believe, he is able to answer our prayers."

I. S. B. "Before the close of 1904, I wish to acknowledge God's mercy in the conversion of a husband before he was called to his eternal home, after twenty years of unceasing prayer in his behalf. Thus we are encouraged to pray without ceasing."

A Reader. "That the faith of some one else may be strengthened, I wish to testify to God's love and mercy. A cloud of darkness and despair hung heavily over me, but it has been lifted, to the extent that I can see my way more clearly, and I will try to trust him more in the future."

A New Brunswick Reader. "As I have read the answers to prayer, and I have been helped and gladdened, and would like the readers to know that I, too, know that God does answer prayer. I was in great trouble, and asked God to bring me out of it; he heard and answered, and I want to tell of his mercy and power, and so honor him."

U. B. W., California. "I am very much interested each week in reading the testimonies to answered prayers, and I desire to add my testimony to the willingness of God to hear and answer the sincere prayers of his humble, loving children. The answer does not always come as we expect, or he may withhold answering altogether, if we ask amiss. His way is always best."

Reader, Illinois. "I have recently been blessed with such a direct answer to prayer, that I feel it my duty and pleasure to add my testimony that this prayer was answered. But this is not always best, for I once asked and was answered, and what sad and bitter experiences I was led through, teaching me how often we ask amiss, and how gracious and kind is our Heavenly Father, who is ever near, and watches over us alike in both times of sorrow and gladness."

Mrs. A. C. B., Georgia. "From my childhood I always took my troubles to the Lord. I've had many an answer to earnest prayer. Recently an accident happened to one of my family, which threatened to deprive her of her eyesight. I took it to the dear Lord, and prayed earnestly for the restoration of her eye. I promised to publish it in the 'Answered Prayer' column and give a thank offering if it was restored. It was soon restored, and I have given my thank offering, and now want to publish it and add my testimony that the Lord answers the prayers of his children."

women. They are the true sisters of Him who was a Carpenter; the pride and glory of their sex; the highborn and high-bred daughters of God! They are to preserve the integrity of American society. They are the safeguards of the American home, and the conservators of the best traditions of our democratic American ancestry.

The hope of this country is a pure, democratic, social fraternity, a genuine and sympathetic social unity based on equality before God, which means more, infinitely more, than mere equality before the law. Our hope is in a Christianized Americanism and an Americanized Christianity: a union of the spirit of liberty and the spirit of religion, as found in our highest domestic, social and political ideals.

I would not deny the cogency of the arguments offered by those who recognize the rapidly developing organizations of the country as an encouraging sign of the times. It is claimed to-day that they indicate the general trend of our people toward fraternity, equality, brotherhood; that they co-operate with the Church in furnishing a safeguard against that social corruption which inevitably results from the recognition of social distinctions in a free government.

But it is the Christian Church where equality should be taught and practised, inculcated and exemplified. The Church of the Carpenter must remain the Church of the Carpenter forever. The common people who heard the Carpenter of Nazareth gladly, must always be able in his Church not only to hear him, but to hear him gladly. When the Church is out of touch with the wage-earner, it is out of touch with Jesus Christ. When there is no longer a welcome in the Church for the common people, there is no longer a welcome for the Son of God, the leader, the champion, the brother of the common people. Where Christ goes, his disciples of industry must go.

Is there danger that our youth grow up with a dread of social ostracism if they choose a life of toil, and elect a trade which will demand a calloused palm and a grimy face? The question of a trade, calling, or profession is becoming a social question with many young men. It is not easily denied that college life fosters the aristocratic spirit. The graduate is often too proud to work; he thinks toil is beneath the dignity of the university man. The professions are overflowing, and overflowing with incompetents. With many a youth the question is: "Which profession or calling will most quickly bring me wealth?"

Wealth is the open sesame to society; money fixes the social status, not honor, brains, virtue, culture, but money; so, get money. But there is society and society. In certain kinds of society no honorable man, no decent, self-respecting woman wants a status. In the best society the wage-earner is at the top. In the Kingdom of Heaven the perfect ideal is the Carpenter, who is the only begotten Son of God.

A Finnish Mission Festival

The Finnish Evangelical Mission in Harlem, N. Y., had its annual Mission festival recently. There was a large attendance of the Finnish people in New York, and many openly confessed Christ. Pastor Blomgren's congregation is hoping to get a larger meeting-place.

Poetical Bulgarian Girls

AT the American College for girls, Constantinople, recently, there was held a "musical party," given by the Bulgarian girl students in honor of their teachers. One who was present has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this interesting description of the event:

"As a group, these girls are much fairer than the Southern girls, light brown hair and pink cheeks and blue eyes being not uncommon among them; but some of them have the black and white coloring of the Orient. They are the most energetic class of girls in the college, and among them are generally found the best students.

"The programme began and closed with piano pieces, and contained four choruses, a duet, and a dialogue. The vocal music is generally minor and plaintive, sung usually in unison, but dropping unexpectedly into two parts. The duet was quaintly sweet, the two light young voices almost sighing the notes, all in unison, until the last note of each verse divided into a sad chord. The following is a translation of the words of the duet, made by a Bulgarian who has studied English but one year:

THE BEGGAR GIRL

After a sumptuous feast, absorbed in gay thoughts,
I was walking homeward late in the night.
At once, in the dark street, I perceived a maiden
Kneeling in the mud, all alone;
Weary, pale, scarcely covered with rags.
When she caught sight of me,
Stretching her trembling hands, and bitterly crying,
Alms she asked from me.
I dropped a coin in her worn out apron.
And, touched by deep emotion,
"Go to your mother," I said,
"Weeeping, perhaps, she waits now for you."
Then her pale and quivering lips
In a poor smile were folded:
And towards heaven sadly glancing—
"My mother is dead," she said.
"She is dead, and the cold my flesh devours,
And hunger pains me every day:
Orphan am I here on the earth,
And no one thinks or cares for me."
I know that it is a great virtue
To mourn over another's sufferings,
And before this poor orphan I felt ashamed
For all the blessings I only had.

"The dialogue was spoken in costume, between a poet from the capital and a simple peasant maid, whose mind is fixed on the harvest, her work, and her lover, whom she expects to meet. To the poet's gushing remarks about the beauty of nature, she returns practical answers, and when he speaks of his Muse, she inquires whether this Muse can reap and gather the corn like herself. The poet attempts to give her some idea of the great town,

Where the national strength lies.
Where all are wealthy,
Free, and educated.

"He tells her how in the city they labor for the country people, making laws for their comfort.

Large are the sums of money
That for your sake we spend:
Most noble are the phrases
That for you have been made.
We use up every day
Great quantities of ink
That light may reign forever
In our dear land.

"To which effusion she replies prosaically:

"Well, we reap for it."

For a Peace Institute in Paris

Mrs. Lucia Ames Mead, of Boston, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that Countess Bobrinsky, of Paris, on reading the appeal of the Peace Propaganda Committee for the cost of a battleship to place centres of propaganda in London, Paris and other capitals, at once gave $20,000 (100,000 francs) for the beginning of a Peace Institute in Paris. This generous gift should induce Americans to take steps at once to establish a peace centre in Washington.

Died on the Way to Tibet

READERS of this journal who remember the brilliant and efficient service rendered by Francis H. Nichols as the special CHRISTIAN HERALD Commissioner to China, during the great famine in Shansi and Shensi, will regret to learn of the death of this faithful correspondent while on a journey to Lhasa, in Tibet.

THE LATE FRANCIS H. NICHOLS

Mr. Nichols, after coming home from China in 1902, soon decided to return again to the East. He foresaw the trouble in Tibet, and believed that Lhasa would be the objective point of interest, and that the long-kept secrets of the "sealed land" would soon be given to the world. His letters in this journal from China, and his well-known book, Through Hidden Shensi, had combined to bring him before the public as a young writer of much literary and scientific promise. His journey to Tibet was therefore regarded with much interest, and the American Geographical Society which, as well as his publishers, was interested in the undertaking, anticipated important results. Mr. Nichols proceeded to Peking, and after procuring credentials from high Chinese officials, started westward to the Tibetan border. He traveled with a few Chinese servants. It was his purpose to learn as much as possible of the language and customs of Tibet before attempting to cross the border. News has been received that, owing no doubt to long-continued exposure to the bitter cold winter of the mountainous frontier, Mr. Nichols contracted pneumonia, resulting in his death. Previous to his first journey to the East, Mr. Nichols had already made his mark as a correspondent. He had done journalistic service in Cuba during the Spanish-American war, and was an eye-witness of the battle of San Juan Hill. He was a frequent contributor to various magazines, and his letters from China during the great famine, which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, were powerful in description and full of sympathy. His eloquent pen aided largely in bringing American aid to the rescue of the suffering nation, and in saving thousands of lives.

Mother Bird's Christmas Tree

SO much had been going on at the Bowery Mission at Christmas time for the "grown-ups," that it was not until the Wednesday after the holiday that the doors could be opened to the children. For days before, however, they had congregated on the sidewalk, and in little knots discussed the good time they were sure to have when they would be allowed to get on the other side of the light-green shades, which hid the interior of the Mission hall from their bright and curious eyes. Appeals of the Mission workers, from the superintendent to the doorkeeper, to go home and wait; advice from the kind-hearted policeman that they had better "skip" before they "got pinched," had no effect on these impatient waiters; they did not intend to be caught napping when the gates to this Bowery paradise swung open and closed again.

Inside was a busy scene during the day and night preceding the distribution of the presents. A large tree whose topmost bough nearly reached the ceiling, was set in front of the organ, almost completely hiding the instrument. Every branch and twig was hung with bright and sparkling ornaments, while silver and golden chains hung in graceful festoons, intermingling with bright colored globes and other fanciful decorations. On one side of the room was a large table, presided over by Mrs. Arey and Miss Hallimond. On one end of the table was piled a mountain of dressed doll-babies for the girls, while games and other gifts for the boys towered in stacks at the other end.

Long before 9 o'clock, A. M., the hour of opening, a line of children two and three abreast, reached from the Mission doors, away around the corner and into the cross street, far down which the restless little creatures could be seen, the girls forming in line from the north, the boys from the south, meeting in front of the Mission doors. At last the doors were opened, letting in about 200 children. When inside, they marched single file past the table, each one receiving a present. Then they were shown the way through the kitchen, where they were given some fruit as they passed down and out through the basement entrance to the street. There were big girls with babies in their arms, and little brothers and sisters held by the hands or clinging to their skirts; boys piloting the "kids" of the family, women with children too small to be trusted alone, and mothers, whose eyes took in hungrily all the brightness, from the glittering tree to the smallest gaily painted toy, as if they would fain take the joyousness with them to illumine their dingy homes. Many of the children as they passed "Mother Bird," held out their hands, while their faces grew bright at her kindly greeting.

Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have contributed to the tree, and Mrs. Bird and all the 2,400 poor children who received presents, are very grateful for the kindness which made this happiness possible.

It was a gala day for the children of the East Side, who look upon the Bowery Mission as a most wonderful place, which Santa Claus never misses.

Port Arthur Surrenders

AFTER a siege lasting eleven months, the fortress of Port Arthur surrendered to the Japanese on Sunday, January 1. The surrender was precipitated sooner than was expected by the capture of the Sungshushan and Panlungshan forts. Early in the preceding week the Japanese had taken the formidable Ehrlung fort, though at great sacrifice of life, and it was not believed that Gen. Nogi would attack the remaining strongholds for some time. His engineers, however, had succeeded in tunneling in two directions under the Sungshu and Panlung mountains, and the first intimations the defenders had of the fact was a terrific mine explosion, under the northwest corner of the Sungshu fort, which filled the air with debris and killed a large number of the garrison.

Another tremendous explosion, under the very centre of the fortress, followed. Nogi's troops then advanced, flinging a shower of deadly hand grenades among the demoralized Russians, who were quickly overpowered. Next to yield were the Panlung Fort and Fort H, the last of the formidable inner defences. On the following day, under a truce flag, messengers from Gen. Stoessel came to Gen. Nogi with proposals of surrender. These were telegraphed to Tokio, and the surrender was finally arranged on Sunday, Jan. 1, on terms acceptable to the Russian commander.

Blind Ira Sankey's Faith in God

THE following letter from the well-known Gospel singer, Ira D. Sankey, now laid aside through total blindness, will be read with sympathetic interest by many thousands of those who are familiar with Mr. Sankey's long life-work with the late D. L. Moody:

"DEAR DR. KLOPSCH.—Through the columns of your valuable paper, and by your kind permission, I desire to thank you and the many friends who have so kindly written me words of sympathy in the great affliction through which I am now passing. It is a source of great comfort to have the assurance of their prayers, and I beg the continuance of the same.

"I have undiminished faith in God, and that all things are working together for my good. I am sure I will be given grace to endure this affliction, and that, whatever comes, the Lord will go with me to the end, as He has promised.

"I remain your brother, until the 'day dawn, and the mists have rolled away.'

"IRA D. SANKEY."

The Test of a True Revival *

WHAT lessons, if any, are to be derived for coming revivals from the revivals of the past? In all true religious awakenings are to be found elements which are permanent, while others are but the products of the occasion. What seems to meet the requirements of one age, apparently is of little value in influencing the next. For example, during the great awakening preaching was the chief means relied upon for the conversion of men, but in the great revival of 1857 union prayer meetings only seemed to be necessary to reach men with the influences of the Gospel, while in the later phases of revival work, the most perfect organization and the most perfectly planned campaigns have been the methods best suited to accomplish the results desired.

There are, however, certain elements of permanency which have been characteristic of all true revivals from Pentecost down to the present time. An analysis of the great revivals of history shows these elements to be prayer, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and the presentation of the Gospel.

Every true revival is preceded by its Pentecost. It is possible to have revivals without preaching, without churches, and without ministers, but without prayer a genuine revival is impossible. The great revival at the Kirk of Shotts, in Scotland, when five hundred were converted under a single sermon by John Livingstone on the 1st of June, 1630, was preceded by a night of prayer. In some portions of this country, the awakening of 1800 was prepared for by days of fasting and prayer. The revival of 1857 commenced with the prayers of a humble layman, while the secret of success in the lives of Finney and Moody is attributable to prevailing prayer. Of his own experience Finney said, "Unless I had the spirit of prayer I could do nothing. If even for a day or an hour I lost the spirit of grace and supplication, I found myself unable to preach with power and efficiency, or to win souls by personal conversation."

The outpouring of the Holy Spirit qualifies the worker, gives force and unction to his utterance, strangely softens the hearts of men and prepares their minds for the reception of the truths of the Gospel.

These three elements—prayer, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and the presentation of Gospel truth—constitute the invariable characteristics of all true revivals from Pentecost to the present time. It is safe to presume, therefore, that there never will be revivals of any great value to the Church of Christ, without relying upon these conditions which seem to be indispensable.

It has been asserted that revivals are but temporal phenomena of religious life, and must ultimately pass away. If we believe in the final triumph of the Kingdom, it follows that there will come a time when revivals will no longer be necessary. But while there is a single impenitent child of God, revivals in some form or other will be a necessity for bringing such into the fold of Christ. Methods which do not constitute the permanent elements in revivals, must change, in fact are changing, so that revivals as we now know them may pass away, but with the passing of the old newer and better methods will be devised, so that revivals in some form or another will survive so long as there are lost men whom it is possible to bring under the influences of the Gospel.

Genuine Gospel Measure

The Crown Dictionary came duly to hand, and I find it to be all, and more, than was promised, and with it am very much pleased, and prize it highly. As I write, the Drop-leaf Calendar is hanging before me. Well, it is beautiful, a perfect gem in its way. Come to think about it, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and those two things of beauty and utility all for only two dollars, is really getting much, very much, for a small outlay of money. Please accept my sincere thanks, and believe me,

Forty Years a Mail-Carrier

WILLIAM H. JAMES, of Rochester, N. Y., is probably the oldest city mail-carrier in the United States. Entering the service at the age of twenty-eight, he has served continuously for nearly forty years, carrying in that time but three different routes. He has traveled extensively. In speaking of his years of service, Mr. James said: "If I live until May 7 next, I will be entitled to two gold stars, which signifies forty years of service. Beyond that, there is no provision made. I suppose the Government thinks that if a man is not worn out by that time, he ought to be." Mr. James bore the holiday postal rush as well, if not better, than many of the younger carriers.

WILLIAM H. JAMES

How Men Are Won*

SPECIAL honor is given in the beginning of the Church of Christ to individual and personal effort. One apostle was brought to Christ by his brother, and another was brought by his friend. Paul tells how men can hear without a preacher; but his own experience might have told him, and the instance of these two early disciples might have furnished additional proof. We rightly honor pulpit effort, and we know that it is the chief source of increase to the church; but how many there are who are led to take the first step toward the kingdom by private and personal work! One man finds another and brings him to Christ.

It is natural that it should be so. The sermon is addressed to a mixed audience. Its appeals it makes must often be made haphazard. The bow is drawn at a venture. But when friend speaks to friend, or brother to brother, there is special knowledge of the man's needs and prejudices, and an intimate perception of the kind of appeal that will move him. The professional element is also lacking. A man to whom his friend goes, with an earnest plea that he will give himself to Christ, realizes that it is disinterested. There is no suspicion that he is seeking benefit for himself; it is the act of one who has experienced the blessing and desires that his friend should share in the good. The Christian, therefore, is under a double obligation to seek the salvation of his friends. On the one hand, the benefits he has himself received from his faith, render it incumbent upon him to make known the blessing to others; and, on the other hand, he is encouraged by the prospect of success, that cannot be so assured in the hands of another. He can influence his friend, as no one else can. If every Christian had done his whole duty in this respect, the world would long ago have been converted to Christ. It is because Christians maintain a shameful silence, that their worldly friends doubt whether religion makes them happy.

How essential it is, too, that such an appeal can be safely based on experience. It was a convincing challenge that Andrew used with Peter and Philip with Nathanael, "Come and see." The work that Christianity does upon a man when he is converted is not to be mistaken. It is an inward and spiritual change, but its manifestation is outward. When the rough, selfish, vicious man becomes pure of life, kind and helpful to his associates, and gentle and magnanimous to all with whom he has to do, something has been done that is akin to the miraculous. There is nothing known to men that works such changes of life, beside Christianity. Every one who has tried to reform a wayward son or a vicious friend, knows how difficult is the task. Yet Christianity has a host of such trophies. Here is the changed nature, "Come and see." Here are homes transformed, peace and quiet where there was once strife and disorder. Come and see what a change has been effected. There are proofs of what faith has done and can do for a man and his family. As a physician produces a patient before an audience and explains what he was, and leaves his hearers to see what he is, so the Christian may point to one another as evidence of the transforming power of the Gospel.

Here, too, is the end of the controversy. It is not always possible to remove the doubts of a quibbler. There is much in religion that cannot be made plain to the reason; much that can be apprehended only by faith. Here is the answer: Come and see. Paul, with all his power of argument, was obliged to confess failure in dealing with opponents. The doctrine of the Cross was to the Jew a stumbling block, and to the Greek, foolishness; but to those who believe, it was the power of God and the wisdom of God. Paul himself could not explain it fully, but he appealed to experience. Let the man come and see, let him test it in his own person, and he would be convinced. The doctrine might be abstruse, but he who had once taken hold upon it could never afterwards become a doubter. He knew.

Best Book of its Kind

I wish to acknowledge receipt of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the book entitled Family Worship for Every Day in the Year, and beg to say I consider this one of the best books of the kind I ever saw.

Pittsburg, Pa. WILLIAM I. JONES.

In the Market of Lauzanne

The market of Lauzanne, Switzerland, is a fascinating old place, perched high on the hill, and reached by the market stairway, a little succession of quaintly roofed flights of wooden steps, so picturesque that an artist can hardly be dragged past them. Here, on market days, one sees the greatest medley of odd things for sale that were ever gathered together. Besides the usual fruit, vegetables, fish, meat and poultry, there is a second-hand book-stall flanked by a booth displaying all kinds of flannelet undergarments, vari-colored, and fearfully and wonderfully shaped. Next to this, strong shoes for the country folks dangle beguilingly over an array of sacred images and crucifixes, surmounted by yards and yards of saints and angels, against a high wall behind. In another corner some wonderfully artistic crockery of a coarse kind, such as makes one long for some means of transporting it in dozens to the home kitchen, so picturesque and distressingly desirable do all these quaintly-shaped vessels in their green, blue, and brown glaze appear. —Constance Fuller McIntyre, in "Four-Track News" for January.

Words of Commendation

The Red Letter Bible, Family Worship, and the Calendar all arrived in safety, and must say that they all exceeded my expectation, although I ought to know by this time what to expect from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, having been getting it for the last eighteen years. R. B. CLARK.

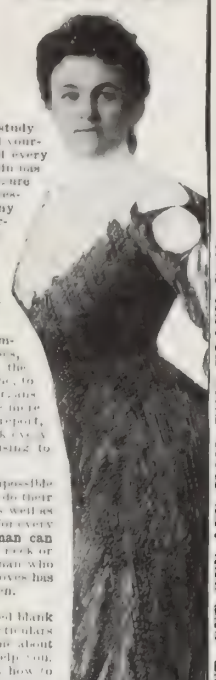
ANY WOMAN CAN

HAVE A GOOD FIGURE

CAN BE

Well Wholesome Happy Vivacious WITH A Clear Skin Strong Brain and a Buoyant Step



OVER 10,000 WOMEN ARE STUDYING THEMSELVES You will doubtless take up some special line of study this year—why not make an exhaustive study of yourself, determining whether every vital organ and every force of your being is perfect, whether your brain has reached its perfect development, whether your figure is symmetrical and whether you have dynamic force and magnetism necessary for attractiveness and for wholesome influence and usefulness. Many a woman in fifteen minutes' work in the privacy of her own room has surprised her husband, family and friends by the results of her self-study this year. There is too much to do, to enjoy, to love and to live for in these gloriously progressing days to permit any woman to waste herself in semi invalidism. Men want bright, buoyant, well poised women who can rise with them, appreciate their efforts and share their triumphs. I have worked with nearly 10,000 women during the past two years, studying with each individual woman to bring her to her best.

EVERY VITAL ORGAN STRONG In my instructions with you by mail, I completely study your case, directing your exercises, bathing and diet, giving you work to bring the strength to every vital organ, every nerve center, teach you to breathe, to stand and to walk well and the reflex action of the strength of the vital organs of rhythmic movement upon the mind is worth more to women than the mere physical. One woman recently expressed this reflex action to me in her report, "Miss Cocroft, I used to feel so depressed and now I feel as if I can look every man, woman and child squarely in the face with a feeling that I am doing to my very best."

EVERY WOMAN CAN HAVE A CLEAR SKIN AND A GOOD FIGURE Unless the body is properly poised it is impossible for the vital organs and nerve centers to do their proper work. From a health standpoint as well as from a standpoint of beauty, it is necessary for every woman to carry herself well and any woman can have a good figure. No woman needs to have an undeveloped chest, neck or bust, in fact, no undeveloped in any particular of her body, and the woman who carries about forty to fifty pounds of superfluous flesh every time she moves has my sympathy, for I realize it is not necessary for her to carry this burden.

WRITE ME ABOUT YOURSELF Will you not mark with the letter x on the attached blank the points which interest you and if there are any particulars in regard to your case which you feel I need, write me about them also and I will tell you frankly whether I can help you. I have worked solely with women for the past thirteen years and I know how to understand as well as help them. As I give every pupil my personal attention, the number is necessarily limited. I never take a pupil unless I feel positive I can help her. Write me fully and frankly of your special difficulties, tell me what you want to gain or change and I will tell you what I can do for you and send you letters from women whom I have benefited and relieved of similar ailments. I will send you, too, my booklet on how to stand correctly, free—every woman should have it. My work is not a "Cure All" system, but I do build up the strength of all the vital organs, lungs, heart, nerve centers, send your blood bounding through your veins as it did when you were a child and give you that dignified bearing which at once bespeaks culture and refinement.

I HAVE BROUGHT HEALTH TO THOUSANDS OF WOMEN I am giving you below extracts from three letters of my pupils on my desk as I write: "For one to realize the benefit I have derived, one ought to have seen me before I commenced and now—several of my friends not having seen me for some time, have told me they should hardly recognize me if I had not spoken. I had rheumatism in my ankles which were swollen most of the time." "Have lost altogether sixty seven pounds." "They are worth their weight in gold to me. I have entirely recovered in less than six weeks from the beginning of my lessons of the most painful attack of what the doctors called 'Catarrh of the Stomach.' No, I never feel a sign of pain there."

I wish you could read the letters from my pupils any one day. I know it would do your heart good as it does mine.

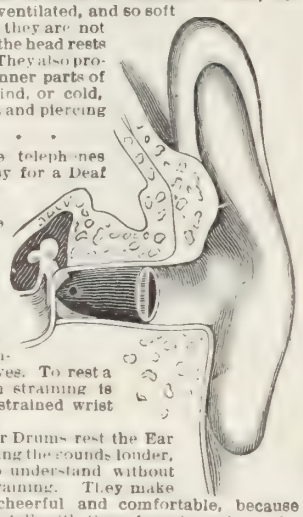
Deaf People Now Hear Whispers

Listening Machines Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but Act Like Eye-Glasses.

Ever see a pair of Listening Machines?
They make the Deaf hear distinctly.
They are so soft in the ears one can't tell they are wearing them.
And, no one else can tell either, because they are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums are to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sight.
Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just as glasses are sight-magnifiers.
They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain off them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. They can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minute, just as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and off.
And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, because they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.



These little telephones make it as easy for a Deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing grows, because they rest up, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.
Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people can talk with their friends without the friends having to shout back at them. They can hear with out straining. It is the straining that puts such a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person.

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound strike hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of preading it weakly all over the surface. It thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struck the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ear drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves. When we make the drum vibrate ten times as much we make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.
This is why people who had not in years heard a clock strike can now hear that same clock tick anywhere in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ear Drums.
Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noises in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and cured (even after Ear Doctors have given up the cases), by the use of these comfortable little ear-resters and sound-magnifiers.
A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.
Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks who were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book. They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.
Some of these very people may live near you, and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.
This book has been the means of making 326,000 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it today. Don't put off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.

Christ's Miracles

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHY should there be, in our day, such a prevalent and increasing disbelief in the miracles of the Lord? Many of the doubters are more or less honest in their doubts. Personal experience of a miracle wrought in our own lives by the mighty hand of God stills all our doubts about the miraculous power and person of our blessed Lord. If he has turned the water into wine in our own souls; if he has brought in us a restless, impatient, unsatisfied heart into a joy and peace which passes all understanding, and has made us love what we previously hated, it is no longer difficult to believe that he stilled the wind and the waves, and that he healed the sick and cast out devils. If, for tens of years, thousands of orphan children have been maintained in India and elsewhere, and hundreds of missionaries by the Lord in answer to the prayers of Christian people, it is not difficult for us to believe that Jesus multiplied the loaves.

There have been humbling confessions on the part of many, who have not scrupled to say, "I do believe," that their faith and practice so little correspond. Does not this arise often from a want of faith in the grace and power of God to deliver us from selfishness, worldliness, harsh judgment of others, pride, vanity, and all which is foreign to the pure, holy, blessed, and blessing life of our beloved Lord? It takes as much of his divine power to deliver us from an unkind thought, as it took to still the storm or to multiply the loaves and fishes; and it is easier for some to trust him for physical strength, in a time of weakness, to do some needed work, than it is to trust him for patience with an awkward servant or a domestic annoyance. But if those who find it difficult to believe should find in those who do believe a power to bear from others what they cannot bear—a peace and satisfaction when everything to all appearance is going wrong, and tends to provoke them—they would have ground for believing that another power than a strong will; a supernatural power, is at work in the believer.

It was prophesied of the Lord Jesus that when he came on earth he should do mighty works. Isaiah, speaking of the coming Messiah, says: "Say ye to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not: behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; he will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing." We have only to search the Gospels, and we find the fulfilment of this prediction. What else was the healing of the blind man in Matt. 9:27-30; of Bartimeus in Mark 10:46-52; of the man born blind in John 9? What else was the unstopping of the deaf man's ears in Mark 7:32? What else were the many cases of the lame healed in Matt. 11:5; 15:30-31; the man at the pool of Bethesda, etc.? What else was his healing of the dumb in Matt. 9:32-33, as well as the many similar cases mentionnd in Matt. 15:30-31?

It is to his miracles that he himself appeals, as the proofs of his Messiahship, in answer to the question of John the Baptist in Matt 11 : 3: "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for Another?" "Go and show John again," was the Lord's answer, "those things which ye do hear and see. The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached unto them." His miracles were the proof that he was supernatural. John the Baptist said of him: "He is mightier than I" Matt. 3:11); "He was before me" (John 1:30). He said of himself ; "A greater than Jonah is here. . . . A greater than Solomon is here" (Matt. 12:41,42), and the whole Gospel of John abounds with the strongest assertions of the Lord himself as to who he was. "I am the Bread of Life; I am the living Bread, which came down from heaven" (6:48:51). "I am the Light of the World" (8:12). How can those who deny his supernatural character do away with his miracles without getting rid of the New Testament altogether?

Have You Had My Free Lesson in Jiu-Jitsu?

IF YOU do not already know that Jiu-Jitsu is the most wonderful system of physical training and self-defence in the world to-day I invite you to write for my FREE LESSON and demonstrate this to your own satisfaction.

It is to the persistent practice of Jiu-Jitsu that the Japanese owe their courage and success in battle, their almost superhuman strength and power of endurance, their low death rate and their material progress. Surely a system of physical training which has done so much for the Island Nation will interest YOU. Jiu-Jitsu not only embodies the ideal principles of attaining perfect health and perfect physical development, but as a means of self-defence it is as potent at short range as the deadliest weapon. A knowledge of its self-preserving principles renders a man or woman impregnable to every form of vicious attack.

Jealously Guarded Secrets Revealed

For over two thousand years the principles of Jiu-Jitsu have been religiously guarded. By an imperial edict the teaching of the system was forbidden outside of Japan. The friendly feeling, however, existing between Japan and the United States has been instrumental in releasing Jiu-Jitsu from its oath-bound secrecy, and I have been delegated to teach, without reserve, all the secrets of this ancient art to Americans.

I have just written an intensely interesting book which explains and makes clear the principles of Jiu-Jitsu in a manner which will never be approached by any American writer. So long as the edition lasts, this book, together with my first lesson in Jiu-Jitsu, will be sent free to interested persons. The lesson is fully illustrated and teaches one of the most effective methods known for disposing of a dangerous antagonist.

If you desire to learn all the closely guarded secrets of this marvelous science, send me your name and address, and you will receive the book and specimen lesson by return mail, postage paid. Address is the title of a book which tells how to invest small sums ($10 or more per month); how to tell a good investment; how you might have converted $100 into $358.83; how to choose between real estate and stocks; how savings banks make their money; how to choose your partners; how to guard against uncertain "prospects"; how to protect yourself in case you should not care to hold an investment indefinitely, etc. This book is not an advertisement of any particular investment. It is a general "talk" about investments, based upon my experiences and observations. Write me a postal, saying simply: "Send How Money Grows." You will receive the book, Free, by return mail.

United Cities Realty Corporation

versus

"Frenzied Finance"

EVERYONE in the United States is reading with intense interest the story which is now running in one of the monthly magazines of the alleged use of the investment funds of the people by men at the head of great organizations for their own private purposes. While it is impossible to say to what extent the writer of these articles is actuated by selfish or revengeful motives—and it is unjust in the highest sense to include the management of all great institutions under the ban which he places upon a few—yet to those who are familiar with the movements of the times and the tremendous influence exerted by comparatively few men upon the finances of the country, the revelation—unsavory as it is—was unquestionably needed, and the financial world will be better for the moral cleansing process through which it is thus made to pass.

Ten years ago the originators of the United Cities Realty Corporation realized that the funds of millions of people placed in investment life insurance did not, to say the least, earn the highest possible income for those who invested. They also realized how unlimited was the field which could be reached by a corporation conceived in honesty, which would be devoted to the investment of instalment funds, where no salaries, no emoluments of any sort were paid, except a fair and publicly known share of the profits of the corporation.

THE NICOLLET BLOCK, MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

One of the latest purchases of the United Cities Realty Corporation. Nets a profit of 11 per cent. annually and is leased for 10 years.

The United Cities Realty Corporation buys the best type of improved city real estate for the person who can invest but a few dollars each month. There is no expense except the actual cost of selling the shares, which is about one-third that of the load carried by the average insurance policy. It pays you all of the earnings of the Corporation up to 5%, and takes one-half of the surplus earnings above 5% for its own services, paying you the balance, and this is its exclusive compensation. It was designed for the benefit of those whose chief responsibility is to provide for their own future, as distinguished from the great work done by the best life insurance companies in providing for the future of dependent ones in straight or ordinary life insurance.

We would like to place before every reader of the Christian Herald our proposition and allow you to determine the spirit in which the United Cities Realty Corporation was constructed and and is managed. Nearly one million dollars' worth of securities has been sold with practically no advertising whatever, and over a million dollars' worth of property has been purchased. We are now entering upon a campaign of active and aggressive publicity, one which will make the United Cities Realty Corporation known in every household in the land. We may not sell you our securities, but we should like the privilege of placing our printed matter before you for your careful consideration, and we are sure you will realize, whether you invest or not, that our organization is founded on the highest principles, the interests of the investors are guarded with the utmost care, the men who are at the head of the corporation are men who stand for not necessarily the biggest, but the best in public life, and the income and profits which we offer you are as much as can be legitimately and honestly offered in any honestly conducted business.

Every person who reads this advertisement is vitally interested in the problem of his own future. Is it not therefore worth your while to devote a minute's time in sending us a postal of inquiry?

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

W. C. J., Harrison, Ark. Man has infinite faculties. That means, does it not, that he should wield infinite power?

Both statements are wrong. There is a limitation to all things human, even the mind. There are problems so noble that in the attempt to grasp them and to reason them out, the mind is obliged to confess its impotence. Scientists find many things in nature that are hopeless of human explanation, and still harder problems in metaphysics and theology. In studies in mental development, read Emerson, Thayer, Marden, Smiles, Thoreau, Carlyle.

J. L., Dubuque, Ia. Will you kindly print the total popular Presidential vote of the different parties in the late election?

Republicans, 7,630,893; Democrats, 5,106,640; Social Democrats, 397,208; Prohibition, 258,039; Populist, 114,106; Social Labor, 32,516.

Mr. A. E. Scott, Buffalo, N. Y., writes:

The Bethesda Home Society wishes to thank you. Many of your readers have answered our appeal, by sending bandages, toys, and books without giving their names, and it was impossible for us to thank them personally. Should you, therefore, feel disposed to allow us to thank them through your columns, for their gifts to the poor lepers in Surinam, we should greatly appreciate your generosity.

J. R., Father John of Cronstadt, is a very pious and greatly respected priest, of the Orthodox Russo Greek Christian) Church. He is a warm friend of the poor, and has been their benefactor many times. He is said to have influence with the Czar, and has used it to good purpose in aiding worthy objects.

T. Y. M., Eldora, Ia. When and what were the dark ages that are often referred to?

The four hundred years after the death of Charlemagne are regarded as having been more barren of culture, art, or intellectual aspiration than any age in European history.

Mrs. J. W. L., Lena, Ill. Who was Melchizedek?

He was an aged priest-king, in an age when the throne and the office of high priest were frequently held by the same person. He was, according to all we learn of him (which is very meagre, indeed), a ruler of eminent piety and greatly revered and beloved, as is evidenced by the fact that Abram paid tribute to him. The statement that he was of no descent is not to be interpreted as meaning that he was without parents, but rather that his father and mother were obscure people and his birth was humble, just as we might say of some one that "he had no descent." Beyond the facts stated in Scripture, there is no record of Melchizedek's reign. He is regarded as a type of Christ.

C. M. C., New York City. E. K. Coulter, clerk of the Children's Court of New York City, says, in the current issue of the Youth's American Review, that 80 per cent. of the youthful wrongdoers brought before that court were either born abroad or are of foreign parentage. Why should this be so, and what is the remedy?

Our immigration of late years has been of a very different character from what it was, many people coming from Southern Europe, and from races which are of a lower physical and moral standard than were the majority of immigrants of the past. Then, too, the environment of many of the children after reaching this country is bad. Deep poverty compels herding in the poorest quarters; days spent in sweatshops, and nights in squalid tenements, result in the children becoming habituated to vice and crime found in these plague-spots. School laws are evaded, that the miserable parents may have the benefit of the children's labor at the earliest possible age. As to a remedy for these deplorable conditions, it certainly is a problem, which must be worked out by changed conditions in the lives of these aliens. How to do this successfully is at present an unanswerable question, which is taxing the brains and hearts of many Christians, reformers, philanthropists, and sociologists.

Mrs. Flora B., Jacobsville, Ill. 1. When was the art of China taken to other countries? 2. In what year was the Battle of Culloden fought between the Scotch and English?

1. The art of China is, next to that of Egypt, probably the oldest in the world. It was communicated to Korea, Japan and other lands long before the Christian Era date uncertain. 2. Culloden was fought between the English under the Duke of Cumberland, and the Scots under the Pretender, Prince Charles Stuart, April 16, 1746.

Mrs. M. L. G., Fairfield, Ia. Conscience is the inward monitor which God has placed in man's heart to enable him to distinguish between right and wrong. But there are consciences that are deadened by long disuse or by sinful lives, and that need to be quickened before they can perform their function fully.

Reader, Salem, Mass. What is the "Book of Nephi"?

You probably mean the "Books of Nephi" of the Mormons, which are among the so-called "sacred writings" of that church. They form part of the Mormon Bible.

Reader. For all information concerning the Silver Greys, Hunkers, Barnburners, Free Soilers, etc., see any good history of the United States. Ellis' History gives the information.

J. H. Sandel, M.D., Plymouth, Pa., writes:

In your issue of November 9th, E. G. sends two four-line verses as a sentiment. These, taken together, form the first verse of a poem by Charles Mackay, found in one of the readers of my school days, entitled "Procrastination." These are the verses:

If Fortune, with a smiling face,
Strew roses on our way,
When shall we stoop to pick them up?
To-day, my friend, to-day.
But should she frown with face of care,
And talk of coming sorrow,
When shall we grieve, if grieve we must?
To-morrow, friend, to-morrow.

If those who've wronged us, own their fault
And kindly pity pray,
When shall we listen and forgive?
To-day, my friend, to-day.
But if stern Justice urge rebuke,
And warmth from Memory borrow,
When shall we chide, if chide we dare?
To-morrow, friend, to-morrow.

If those to whom we owe a debt,
Are harmed unless we pay,
When shall we struggle to be just?
To-day, my friend, to-day.
But if our debtor fail our hope,
And plead his ruin thorough,
When shall we weigh his breach of faith?
To-morrow, friend, to-morrow.

For virtuous acts, and harmless joys,
The minutes will not stay.
We've always time to welcome them,
To-day, my friend, to-day.
But care, resentment, angry words,
And unavailing sorrow,
Come far too soon, if they appear
To-morrow, friend, to-morrow.

Kenneth, A. S., Norwalk, Conn. Will you please give me some information concerning Millet, the great French artist?

Jean Francois Millet, was a painter of French peasant life. It has been said that France has produced in her day no greater or more original artist. Millet came of a peasant family, and was born on the 4th day of October, 1814, in the hamlet of Gruchy, near Greville, in the wild and picturesque district called Le Hague.

His boyhood was passed working in his father's fields, but while the others slept at night, he studied the engravings in an old illustrated Bible, and his daily hour of rest was devoted to trying to render the familiar scenes around him. The boy's gifts were recognized by his teachers, but when his father died in 1835, Jean, who was the oldest son, returned home, not leaving it again, until to pressing calls from without were added the wishes of the family. He finally went to Paris for study and instruction. Millet's first success was obtained in 1844, when his "Milkwoman," and "Lesson in Riding," attracted favorable notice. The last twenty-seven years of his life were spent in a three-roomed cottage in Brabizon, a village near the Fontainebleau forest. From 1852 to 1871, the artist produced many beautiful pictures, among them were "The Reapers," "The Gleaners," and "The Angelus." He died on the 20th of January, 1875.

H. B. W., Hill City, Kan., writes:

We object to bearing the name of "Campbellites," because we believe that the Scriptures teach that we should own no name but that of the great Head of the Church. We are not the only Christians, but we are Christians only. That there are Methodist Christians and Presbyterian Christians, etc., we do not deny; but for us, just simple "Christian," is all sufficient. Others, may be able to reconcile, what seems to us, the inconsistency of applying, to a divine institution, the Church, a human name, but to us it seems sin. It is a matter of conscience with us. We claim that Alexander Campbell never founded a church; no one but Christ ever founded a church, and he calls it "My Church."

Inquirer, Ware, Mass. 1. Will you please tell me when the terrible war in the East began? 2. What is signified by "wearing the green" on St. Patrick's day?

1. Hostilities began on Feb. 9, 1904, with the attack by the Japanese fleet at Chemulpho and port Arthur. 2. The "green" is the national color of Ireland, "The Emerald Isle," and the wearing of a sprig of green or a green ribbon, is the public avowal of Irish patriotism.

Lizzie J. M., West Derry, N. H. Can you tell me where I can get the war song entitled "The Gallant Sixty-ninth"?

We have been unable to trace the song.

C. H. W., Batesville, Ind. Did Christ give the "water of life" to the woman of Samaria?

The water of life as Christ spoke of it to her, was emblematical. It was the new spirit the divine life which he could impart. He used the symbol in connection with the woman's own occupation, and in reference to her remark. We infer that she was among the Samaritans mentioned in John 4:39, who believed on Jesus, though it is not stated. If she did, she would learn by experience what was the "water of life."

Mrs. B. H. P., Washington Courthouse, O. Did God make the devil? If not, who did? There was an old gentleman who asked me that question, I told him I had never given it any thought.

It is an old and favorite question used by sceptics and scoffers. It is useless to speculate on these things. All we know of the matter is that Satan is a fallen angel.

G. D., Plainville, Kan. I notice that the Revisers have given an entirely different meaning to Isa. 9:3. What authority had they for changing it?

The old reading was, "Thou hast multiplied the nation and not increased the joy." The meaning seemed contradictory and the Revisers, in looking up the passage in the most ancient manuscripts, found that the Hebrew word had an asterisk over it, indicating that the ancient scribes were in doubt about it. The Hebrew word in the passage is Lo. If it is so written it means "not," but if it is written with an apostrophe thus, L'o, it means "to it." It is evident that the apostrophe was there originally, as in that way and no other does the passage make sense. The scribes evidently thought so and the Revisers changed the rendering to, "Thou hast multiplied the nation; thou hast increased to it the joy."

S. W. S. M., Indianapolis, Ind. About a year ago I conceived the idea of committing to memory one or more verses of Scripture from each book in the Bible. In making a selection of verses I would carefully read the whole book and then select the verse or verses that appealed most to me, and in this way have really made a study of every book of both the Old and New Testaments. I have derived not only a great deal of pleasure and information from this method of study, but have been much benefited, and can readily quote what has appealed to me to be the cream of any book in the Bible. In the hope that others may try my method of study and be helped as I have been, I submit the following verses which I have committed to memory: Genesis 8:22, Numbers 6:24-25-26; Judges 7:20; II Samuel 22: 17; I Chronicles 16: 29; Exodus 34:12; Deuteronomy 30:14; Ruth 1:16-17; I Kings 8: 30-39; II Chronicles 19: 7; Leviticus 25: 17; Joshua 24: 11; I Samuel 3: 19; II Kings 6:17; Ezra 8:23; Nehemiah 9:21; Psalms 34:19; Solomon's Song 8:6; Lamentations 3:40-41; Hosea 12:6; Obadiah 3; Nahum 1:7; Haggai 1:9; Esther 8:16; Proverbs 16:7; Isaiah 55:1-2, 41:10; Ezekiel 36: 26; Joel 2:13-27; Jonah 2:9; Habakuk 3:17-18; Zechariah 7:10, 8:17; Job 28:28; Ecclesiastes 12:13; Jeremiah 17:7-10; Daniel 12:3; Amos 5:14-15; Micah 6:8; Zephaniah 2:3, 3:9; Malachi 3:16; Matthew 5:11-12, 26; 11; John 3:18; I Corinthians 2: 9, 13:12; Ephesians 6: 13; I Thessalonians 2: 12; II Timothy 4: 8-15; Hebrews 13: 5; II Peter 2: 9, 3:11; III John 4; Mark 8: 36-37; Acts 16: 31; II Corinthians 4:8-9; Philippians 4: 11; II Thessalonians 3: 13; Titus 2: 2; James 5; 16-20; I John 5: 14-15; Jude 20-21; Luke 6:37-38; Romans 5:1, 8:11; Galatians 6: 9-10; Colossians 3: 17; I Timothy 6: 12; Philemon: 5; I Peter 4: 12-13; II John 8; Revelations 14:13.

A Rare Selection

This is now two years since I subscribed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I have during that short period replenished my bookcase with what I call a rare selection of books given as premiums with that paper. They include Rev. DeWitt Talmage's twenty volumes of Selected Sermons, the Crown Encyclopedia, five volumes; the Hall of Fame, the Speaking Oak, Onward to Fame and Fortune, and for this year the Crown Dictionary, the Golden Treasury, Family Worship Day by Day, not to forget the beautiful Calendar and the monthly magazines.

I would not miss these rare gifts for ten times the cost. I could not in all literature find anything more interesting and better that would supply one's wants.

"THE CHRIST OF THE ANDES"

HOW THE GREAT STATUE OF THE SAVIOUR WAS SET UP AS A PEACE MEMORIAL BETWEEN CHILE AND ARGENTINA

"SOONER shall these mountains crumble to dust, than Argentines and Chilians break the peace which, at the feet of Christ the Redeemer, they have sworn to maintain!"

The inauguration of the monument of Christ the Redeemer, on the Cordillera of the Andes—a monument of international peace between Chile and Argentina—has a grand significance, at once political and social. The colossal statue upon that pinnacle, 14,000 feet above the sea, surrounded by peaks of perpetual snow, dominating as it does the two countries which stretch out on either side of the mountain range, is a tangible witness of international brotherhood, expressing the sentiments of peace of the two countries, whose people have been nurtured in the same cradle and whose history is one, though they had so long been blinded by foolish antagonisms. They can now look up toward the mountain and realize the lesson of peace, of that supreme law: "Love thy neighbor as thyself." The Divine Master, the personification of concord and love, points out to the two republics their future path, and the love which will make of humanity in the generations to come one world-wide family, and the whole earth the home of peace!

In 1898, when an outbreak of the old hostility between the two nations seemed imminent, through the mediation of Queen Victoria, peace was once more restored between Chile and Argentina. For over seventy years there had been constantly recurring disputes relating to the true boundary lines between the two republics. But the people were only half satisfied with the result of the mediation; the feeling of jealousy and hate had not been fully smothered, and it only required a spark to rekindle the old fires. In 1900, the desire to prove to themselves and the world which was the stronger nation, seemed to have gained ground. Both had prepared for war. Chile and Argentina had spent millions, and were equipped with the destructive inventions of modern warfare; each nation seemed ready to fly at the other, while the press of both countries (with rare exceptions), was discussing the comparative prowess of the two nations, and even went so far as speculating as to which had the better fighting chance.

About this time the Argentine Bishop of Cuyo, Monsenor Benavente, gave public expression to an idea which caught the hearts of both nations. He spoke for international peace, and suggested a statue of Christ, to be placed at Puente del Inca, on the very dividing line between the sister republics, and where it could be seen by all travelers. He urged that the countries should settle their ancient quarrels forever, and rear on that snowy borderland "a colossal bronze figure of the Christ, to record the treaty of love and peace, and that it should be consecrated as a perpetual obligation, to be transmitted to the generations yet to come." He urged it also as a means of "tempering all ardor for war, and dispelling all prejudices between the Atlantic and the Pacific."

Deep in the hearts of the Chilians this thought took root. The young Argentine sculptor, Senor Mateo Alonso, was selected for the work, and after a time the statue was cast in the Arsenal of Buenos Ayres, from bronze cannon which had stood for many a year upon a fortress on the outskirts of the city.

The year 1902 was fast coming to a close, and notwithstanding the signing of two treaties (May 28th and July 11th), regarding the disputed territory of Patagonia, the statue was no nearer leaving its place in the yard of the College of Lacordaire than if it had never been cast. Meanwhile the Church and the women of Chili and Argentina worked untiringly for the cause of peace. The press was less bellicose in its attitude, and throughout both lands pulsated the impression of a better day coming. Material and economic considerations spoke to the hearts of the men of business. The two nations talked things over, with the result that, in May, 1903, the cruiser Chacabuco left Valparaiso, carrying the treaties of peace and the delegates for their consummation.

What pen can describe the scene which presented itself as, escorted by the whole Argentine fleet, decked to the mizzen with bunting, and along the docks of Buenos Ayres with their 3,000 ships, 1,000 of them steamers in gala array, the ship of peace slowly made its way to the dock, where stood the representatives of the sister nation ready to extend the hand of welcome. On the 21st of May, 1903, for the first time, a Chilian man-of-war was publicly welcomed and made fast to the soil of Argentine. King Edward had sent his representative, Sir Thomas Holdrich, as arbitrator, with full instructions "to make peace with honor, if possible to do so." The Chilian and Argentine delegates, at the preliminary meeting, addressed the King through Sir Thomas Holdrich, in these words: "In your hands we place ourselves, shutting our eyes to all mean and narrow thought, and praying God that we shall open them upon the luminous horizon of an honorable peace."

Buenos Ayres from May 21 to June 3, 1903, was a round of entertainments, banquets and fireworks; every one was celebrating, feeling sure that those entrusted with the fate of the nations would proclaim peace once more. When the final result of the meeting of the delegates in the Palace of Industries became public, "joy was unconfined."

But something more beautiful was yet to come. It was the inspiration of Senora Angela de Oliviera Cezar de Costa, to invite personally President Roca of Argentina, and the delegates and representatives from other countries, to the College of Lacordaire, to inspect the great Statue of Christ, which in the merrymaking and tumult of the last few days had been almost forgotten. At the foot of the statue there gathered not only the churchmen and the diplomatists, but the mothers of Argentina. Senora Costa, in a voice trembling with emotion, asked that this statue of the Christ be placed on the highest accessible pinnacle of the Andes, between the two republics, as a monument of peace between Chilians and Argentines. When the delegates left the college yard, the destiny of the great statue was assured.

Last February, steps were taken toward the erection of the monument. The site selected is 14,000 feet

Transcendent Light

TEXT—Matt. 5 : 14 :

"Ye are the light of the world"

AT no time since the beginning of the world has man been confronted with such a multiplicity of diverse and even conflicting systems of religious belief as now. Yet all of these systems appeal with more or less force for his acceptance and support. In the East, Mohammedanism, Confucianism, Buddhism, and similar beliefs maintain the ancient vigor of their creed in the appeal to human credulity and superstition, while Europe and the Western world have their numerous systems of creeds and "cults," each presenting its claims for man's belief and allegiance. Thus the great problem presents itself: Are these systems of religious belief and worship really efficacious? Are their dogmas, tenets, and creeds; their ways of thinking and living; their social, fraternal, or religious spirit as organizations—are these things what they ought to be, or what they claim to be? Are their teachings true? And how may we distinguish beyond all doubt, the true from the false?

An infallible test is supplied to us by Christ himself, by which we are enabled to decide as to the real value of any religious system. He tells us that we may know whether its claims are valid by its effect on the lives of its adherents. "Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit."

An illustration of this test is furnished by the fakirs of India. The principle of self-denial is commendable, and we admire men who sacrifice their comfort, and devote themselves to service for the world. But the principle ceases to be admirable when it produces voluntary squalor and filth such as is exhibited by the fakirs. It must be a corrupt tree that produces specimens of humanity so debased and disgusting as these men.

False Lights

I have seen these fakirs. They did not seem to me to be men, or even wild beasts. They were a lower creation. They seemed to have crawled out of the darkest caverns of an Inferno. I have seen them with their matted hair and filthy bodies; I have seen them with uncut finger nails, six inches long, and twisted about in all shapes. I have seen them, as John L. Stoddard describes them in one of his lectures, "A combination of beggar, fanatic, impostor, and spy. In disgusting surroundings resembling a garbage heap, a score of these men were seated, entirely naked, upon a mound of ashes, in which they rolled repeatedly. They even rubbed the dirt all over their bodies, which had been previously greased in order to retain it. Their hair, matted with filth, reached nearly to their waists, and was painted yellow, and on this they threw occasionally handfuls of dust and ashes. A sickening feeling came over me at the sight of this human degradation, especially when I remembered that there are in India more than a million of these half-crazed mendicants and frauds, who are revered and almost worshiped by multitudes of men and women, who will actually stoop and kiss their feet." "Are these the fruits of India fakirism?" you ask. "Is that the result of the oath of poverty under which some Hindus worship? Then I want none of it. Away with it. Its fruits are worm-eaten and filthily diseased and bad." By the fruits found in the lives of the believers, ye must judge the result of a creed, or system of belief.

Why do you not worship God, as do the dancing dervishes of the East? "How do they worship him?" you ask. Instead of entering a little church as you or I, to kneel in prayer, they begin to move around in a circle. They keep on circling around and around until your brain gets dizzy with looking at them. They dance on and on, more and more furiously, until after awhile, some work themselves into the most violent forms of physical hysteria, or in utter bodily exhaustion, drop in their tracks in a dead swoon. "Oh," you say to me, "that is no true worship of God. The holy God does not expect any devotee to make an imbecile out of himself. Away with the worship of the dancing dervishes. By the fruits of a creed or a cult, studied in the lives of the men and women who believe in and practice it, you can judge the truth or the falsity of the teachings.

By the same criterion according to which we judge the failures of the false religions, the world is to judge the failure or the efficacy of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The Saviour, in the words of my text, is practically saying, "Men, women! it is to you I look to exhibit the principles of my religion to the world. My life will be short, my teaching will soon be forgotten, unless you, my followers, embody it in your lives. The only way in which the world can know the grandeur and purity of the truths I have taught, must be in the lives you lead. You are the light of the world. Ye are my representatives upon earth. Ye are the flaming torches to guide sinners to the foot of the cross. Hear me, men! Hear me, women! Hear me, children, who profess to be my disciples. Ye are the light of the world, by which the world may judge whether or no my Gospel is a saving Gospel." Ye members of Christian churches, is it not an overwhelming fact that it depends on our lives, what is the estimate the world will form of the religion we profess? What an impressive fact it is, that men will determine by our lives whether Christianity is the sustaining, the transforming power that it claims to be.

The Divine Light

Christ's disciples, in the first place, must have a divine light. Their fires must be ignited at the great altars of God's mercy. They must so live and act, that they shall feel God has pardoned and cleansed them from all sin. They must so live and act that other people will feel that spiritual fires are burning within them, and that those spiritual fires are cleansing the impurities out of their lives. The greatest purifier on earth is fire. As we are appointed to lead others to the Christian altars, we must guide them by a flame which is pure, because Christ's fires have burned and are burning within us.

Only the divine light can produce the true light of life. "One day, the lantern was talking to the candles, which stood upon the mantel," wrote an imaginative author. "Oh, how much my master thinks of me," it said. "He has often told me it would be impossible for him to go out into the dark nights, if I did not go with him to point him out the way." "Ay, ay," answered a candle, "that may be all true. But your master would sing a different song if it were not for my bright eye in your socket, shining through your windows of glass. Did it never occur to you, oh, lantern, that you would amount to naught, unless my light shone within you and through you." Christian disciples, does it not occur to you that you are as nothing, and will continue to be as nothing, as a divine light, unless Christ's light is in you and shines through you. We must have a divine flame burning within us, before we can be a divine light to a sinful and a dying world.

But though the divine flame within us is absolutely essential for the sending forth of a divine light out of our lives, how many of Christ's professed disciples neglect imparting the holy fires within themselves, which are always burning at God's mercy seat. In one of the heathen temples of the East, I saw a fire which the priests told me had been in existence hundreds of years. Those priests never allow that fire to go out. Have we always kept the divine flame burning within us? By diligent and unceasing prayer, by continual reading of God's Word, by holy communications with God's saints, by a pure, gentle, true, forgiving spirit, have we always fed the necessary fuel to the fires of our spiritual life. Like Enoch, have we been continually walking hand in hand with God? Do not think for one instant that you can impose upon the world an earthly flame as a heavenly light.

The Spiritual Ear

A musician told me recently, that she could intuitively feel when she was playing, whether or not the members of her audience loved music. If there were twenty listeners present, and nineteen were merely pretending to be lovers of harmony, she would play over the heads of those nineteen to the twentieth, who loved music for music's sake. So, in your life, God knows whether your light is a divine flame, and man also, intuitively, can separate the earthly light from the divine. Oh, so-called Christian disciples, before you attempt to lead others to the Cross, get the divine fires burning within you at the altars of your own hearts. Be not like the five foolish virgins with lamps, but with no divine oil for their lamps. Pray, pray, pray! Plead, plead, plead at the altars of mercy for this light! He only can make the spiritual fires burn within you.

When the divine fires begin to burn within us, what happens? Their influence exerts itself all around us. Their power is felt by the people with whom we come in contact. Their quickening rays fall on fields that we know not of, and nourish and develop seed that may have been carried from remote sources. Many years ago, Mr. Beecher, homesick and lonely, was wandering through an Alpine village, where, to his surprise, he found some of the American flowers growing in the gardens of the Swiss hamlets far from their native soil. When our Gospel light begins to shine, it will develop spiritual plants in fields or rocky soil and in mountain ravines, far from the places we ever expect to find them.

Developing Light

Did you ever stop to think that spiritual seeds are a great deal like the common seeds we plant in our gardens? Their development depends not more upon the soil than the sunbeams which kiss them. "What is the matter with my garden?" I ask a neighbor. "I have bought exactly the same kind of seed as you. I have faithfully watered the ground every morning and evening. I have dug out all my weeds as soon as they poke their green heads above the surface of the earth. Yet, here am I, with a few straggling plants, looking for all the world as though they were dying from a fatal attack of typhoid in a 'Hospital of Flowers,' while you have roses galore and great sturdy floral beauties, that are scattering their incense every whither." "Ah!" answers my neighbor, "you have starved your plants for light. You have not given them the sun's rays. Make your garden not under the shadow of a wall. Dig it in a place where the first sunbeam which dances over the Eastern hills can play hide-and-seek among your roses. Give them sunlight! Flowers, like vegetables and harvest fields, must have light. They must have light!" All men have their spiritual seeds within them, even the lowest of social outcasts. These seeds may be developed. But what they need is spiritual light. If you are the light of the world, it may be your privilege, by the grace of God, to quicken them into life. They are dormant now, but when the light implanted in your soul shines upon them, they may awake into vigorous life and bear fruit to the glory of God. What sinful man needs is Gospel light, divine light, spiritual light.

Living Light

If this deduction is true, I would be careful how your spiritual light touches that drunkard, or that beggar, or that woman with a faded shawl who goes down under the gaslight. I would be careful how you speak to that man, who cheats you in business, and has lied about you. The ancient Romans had a custom of placing a lighted lamp in the coffins of their dead. During the pontificate of Paul III, when the coffin was dug up containing the body of Tullia, the daughter of Cicero, the famous orator, such a lamp was found among her bones. It was a strange idea to give the dead a light on their path beyond the grave. Better far is the Christian hope that the divine light, kindled during life in their souls, will shed its rays on their path to the heavenly haven.

Our divine light is a quickening and transforming light. It is also a guiding light. It not only calls into spiritual activity those human seeds, buried in the quagmires of sin: it guides to Christ those wandering souls, which, like a mariner who has lost his reckoning, are drifting toward the rocks of Destruction. How many a weary soul tossed in the storm, with hope and courage failing, may find strength and spirit revive as it sees the divine light kindled by the grace of God in your soul shining out clear and true, as the sailor is cheered by the sight of the Diamond Shoal light which signals year in and year out fifteen miles to seaward, off Cape Hatteras, or the Cape Charles light which burns upon the water front of Old Virginia, or the Hog Island Shoal lighthouse which burns off of Rhode Island.

How necessary that the Christian's light should be always bright and shining! How many souls there may be looking to it for guidance through the storms of life! If it failed to burn, those souls might lose their say, as were the Barnegat light snuffed out, some noble ship freighted with precious lives might, in the darkness, go crashing on the reefs. Near Michigan City, I enter a lighthouse established there many years ago by the United States Government. I see there an old woman, over eighty years of age, by the name of Miss Harriet S. Colfax. For forty years she has cared for that precious light. I say to her, "Come, let us take a night off and go see some friends. You have been a faithful servant to our government long enough. Take just one night to yourself in forty years." "Oh, no," she would answer. "I cannot go. To-night there might come up a storm. A ship driven before the wind might head towards these dangerous rocks. The captain, standing upon the bridge, would peer out into the darkness saying, 'Where am I? Michigan City lighthouse must be near at hand. Harriet Colfax has never failed me in the past.' If I failed him to-night, perhaps that captain and all his crew might find a watery grave. I cannot go to-night.

Misleading Lights

Would you have a simile of Miss Colfax's answer? As I, a seaman, sail over the sea of life, I find I have been watching certain spiritual lights, as Lake Ontario captains watch Michigan City lighthouse. If these spiritual lights had failed me, I know that I would have been lost. It was my mother's prayers, my father's guidance, it was certain Christian leaders' hands, which led me right. As I was dependent upon the spiritual lights of others, I know that others are watching your spiritual lights and mine. Oh, man! Oh, woman! be careful, and not give out false lights to your fellow Christians. Be careful that you do not say one word, which might lead some one to leave the right course. It was just a sentence, "I do not believe in the excitements of revivals," uttered by the President of Princeton college, that kept Aaron Burr from becoming a Christian and a man of God, instead of a monster of iniquity. Watch well your lives lest your inconsistency cause some weak soul to stumble. As Paul said he would eat no meat while the world endured, if meat caused his brother to offend, so do you beware, lest your indulgence dim the light which you should be giving. Ye are the light of the world. Ye are the lighthouses, standing sentinels over the rocks of sin, upon which many a Christian craft will be wrecked if your light goes out. Burn brightly. Burn true.

But I find the divine light in man looks after God's weaklings in a temporal, as well as in a spiritual sense. It strives to lift the iron heel of tyranny from the prostrate neck of the helpless. It labors to prevent injustice and crime, and evil temptations of all sorts, from walking unchallenged through our streets to be a menace to the lives of our boys and girls. It sees that one class of men shall not be allowed to quench this fiendish thirst for the blood of another's arteries. Darkness is the symbol of sin. Light is the symbol of the Gospel. The one mission of the Gospel light is to develop men for Christ. The other mission is to burn out sin wherever found. In the light of the Gospel, we, as Christian men and women, must go forth to plead for Christ with men in a spiritual sense. With the white slip of paper at the ballot box, we also must place the protecting guards about them in a legal sense.

The sunbeams can cure physical disease. The Gospel light, if Christian people will only perform their Christian duties at the ballot box, will cure governmental disease. The late Dr. Neils Finsen, by scientific investigation found that certain microbes would die under certain colored lights. We know that all governmental injustices and social crimes and city temptations, will disappear under the bright rays which may be flashed from the Gospel light. Thus, it is every Christian's duty to see to it that as far as he may be able, he shall have a Christian supervisor, and a Christian common-council, and a Christian mayor, and a Christian governor, and a Christian congressman, and a Christian senator, and a Christian President of the United States. If Christian church members will stand shoulder to shoulder at the ballot box, the injustices and crimes, and evil temptations which run rampant through our great cities, will no longer exist.

The Yielding Spirit

But I bethink myself, as I come to the close of this sermon on "Transcendent Light" that I have two duties. The one is to the servant of Jesus Christ. The second is to the man and the woman who have not yet been willing to accept the Saviour's love. The one is to the disciple of the Christian light; the second is to the child of Satan, who is living in the darkness of sin. These are the two classes of my audience. There is no third group. For "He that is not with me, is against me, and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth abroad." As I come to this closing part of my sermon, I tremble with excitement. I know, as you ought to know, the tremendous results of your decision. Why do I tremble? Because your father, your mother, your wife, your child, or the preacher of this morning, cannot make you become a "child of Light," if you are not willing to do so of your own accord.

The Gospel light, like that of the sun's light, with all of its creating, saving power, is the easiest of all great influences to be resisted. The lightnings strike everywhere. The sun's heat cannot be ignored, even if one would. When the hot summer months come, all who can do so flee from the cities and live themselves away to the woods or the seashore. Closed doors and windows, make the stifling air only the more oppressive. The poor little children moan and cry. The sick, if they are not taken away to the seashore or the high mountains, often die.

You cannot escape if you would the sounds of the cannonadings of the elements, when the thunder-storm begins to growl and to crash. The frightened girl may run to her bed-room and close the windows and draw the shades and bury her ears in the pillows. The booming discharges of the heavenly artilleries send their echoes even through stone walls. But the sunlight can be overcome so easily that all one has to do is to close the eyelids and tie a bandage over the face, and as a blind man he will have to grope his way along the darkness. All one has to do is to plant your flowers under the shadows of a wall, and you can see them pale and droop and wither and die. Light may have a creating, a developing, a protecting, but light will never force its way through a blocked vestibule, or through a thick obstruction which has been erected to keep it out. Thus, the Gospel light will never enter your heart unless you wish it to come.

What is your life to be? What is your death to be? What is your eternity to be? One moonlight night, upon the Hudson River, there came the quick ring of the pilot's bell, warning the engineer that danger was ahead. It was a moonlight night. No boat was near. The ship was in midstream, so the engineer could not tell what the signal meant. He went at once to the pilot-house. There, he found the old pilot dying. As he lifted up the prostrate man, the pilot murmured, "It is dark. Tell the captain, it is dark and I can't see." Oh, my friends, is your life's close to be shrouded in dark mists? Is your "River of Death" to be, in a spiritual sense, like that of the Hudson River pilot, in an atmosphere impenetrably, awfully and eternally dark?

"THE CHRIST OF THE ANDES"

above the sea, on a plateau of about twelve acres, on the dividing line between Chile and Argentina, a short distance from Portillo, a station of the already completed Trans-Andean Railway (which will be finished by another year, thus connecting the Atlantic and Pacific). Senor Mateo Alonso personally directed the placing of the huge granite blocks which serve as a pedestal. Upon these, early in March, 1904, the statue was placed. The figure itself is twenty-six feet in height. The statue, pedestal and base were carried across the 654 miles by rail to Mendoza, where the huge crates were transferred to gun carriages, for the journey of many miles over mountain roads. Soldiers and sailors acted as guard to the precious burden. In many instances, fearing that if left to the mules to draw, an accident might happen, these sturdy men took the ropes themselves and drew the heavy carriages over those Andean roads, where a false step might mean inevitable death.

GREETINGS AT THE FOOT OF THE STATUE

On the 13th of March, both nations participated in the final exercises. Hundreds had encamped on the heights the night before. The Chilian and Argentine representatives arrived early, and found already awaiting them the military and naval forces of both countries, the Argentine troops occupying Chilian territory and those of Chile standing upon the soil of Argentina. The triumphant march of these armies through cities and towns had not been marred by sadness or slaughter. The meeting was solemn and affecting. The thunderous roar of cannon was rolled along these great mountains until the indistinct echoes were lost in the distance. Between the saluting of guns, there rose the swell of martial music, the "dianas" and national hymns of Chile and Argentina. There were loud Vivas for Chile and Argentina, for the cause of peace and for Presidents Roca and Riesco.

This interchange of mutual good-will was followed by a religious ceremonial, offered by Archbishop Espinosa of Argentina, and at ten o'clock, amid profound silence, the veil was drawn aside, revealing the great statue to the assembled multitude. It was then formally dedicated "to the whole world, that from here, a pinnacle of the Andes, it may take the lesson of 'Peace on earth, and good-will toward men.' Eloquent speeches and more music followed, and just before sunset, the Argentine priest, Senor Cabrera, pronounced the prayer and benediction:

"Oh, God, will it that war shall disappear. Put out the fires of rivalry and hate, and cause to reign among men concord and love. Give unto the nations peace, benevolence and order, and to such end let the spirit of evil be broken, let the dew of thy loving-kindness descend upon and penetrate the hearts of men. Thy grace fall upon all men. We ask this in the name of thy blessed Son, the great Herald of Peace. Go ye in peace."

Chile and Argentina have not only created a symbol; they have inculcated into the minds of men for all ages an idea of greater significance than any other in our contemporary age, that colossal monument to the Christ, with the inscription on its granite pedestal: "Se desplomaran estas montanas antes que Argentinos y Chilenos rompan la paz jurada a los pies del Cristo Redentor." "Sooner shall these mountains crumble to dust than Argentines and Chilians break the Peace which, at the feet of Christ the Redeemer, they have sworn to maintain." On the opposite side of the base are the words of the angels' song over Bethlehem: "Peace on earth, good-will to all men!" The statue cost about $100,000, and was paid for by popular subscription, the working-classes contributing liberally.

On the 15th of April, 1904, through the Russian Minister in Buenos Ayres, there was presented to the Government of Argentina a note of congratulation and sympathy from the Czar regarding the great work for peace, and asking for all possible information regarding the Christ of the Andes; it has been decided to accede to the wishes of the Russian Emperor, to send him an exact bronze reproduction, in miniature, of the statue of the Christ. May it carry a message!

Let us thank God that, whatever the motives which prompted the nations, whatever the incentive which will keep it alive, Argentina and Chile have already, in the beginning of this great century, cast the first votes for Universal Peace! They have "ushered in the dawn of the day at whose meridian Peace will become permanent."

In the Canadian Lumber Camps

By AUBREY FULLERTON

SAVING men from the vices of idleness by giving them something to think about, is what the Reading Camp Association, a unique organization in Central Canada, is now doing.

There are few of the world's workers who pass busier days and idler hours of leisure than the men on the frontier—the lumbermen, miners, and railway builders. Hard work by day, and empty hours of loafing at night and on Sundays, make up the sum of their lives. There is small place for heart-culture in such a life. The Gospel of work is ordinarily the only Gospel of the woods and the camp, and where God is forgotten there is little regard for things beautiful or informing. Idleness then becomes the seed-time of evil influences. These conditions are found wherever a new country is being opened up, as in the northern part of Ontario, where fifty thousand men are at work each year in lumber camps along the shores of Lake Superior and Georgian Bay, and in the country eastward. There are also a number of mining camps in various parts of the district, and just now a two years' enterprise, the building of a railway northward, is under way. Camp life under these several forms has a moral danger.

AFTER THE DAY'S WORK A CORNER OF A CAMP READING ROOM

In this camp one man is from California, one is a Stundist, one a Doukhobor; one boy is from Ohio, two from Ireland; there is one Indian, several French-Canadians, and some men from nowhere in particular. The "sleep camp" is apart from the "cook camp." Bunks, each holding two, are built in tiers. No springs or mattresses are supplied, but only blankets, and possibly a little straw. A large stove, around which are hung mittens, socks, and moccasins, is in the centre of the room, and here sleep choppers, sawyers, swampers, teamsters and others. There is no privacy.

These men live near to nature, but the lack of restraint, and the necessity of providing their own entertainment, are their constant temptation. This is the problem: What to do when the day's work is done? There is opportunity for things worth while, but little inclination, unless with some aid or stimulus from the outside. To give this stimulus is the task of the Canadian Reading Camp Association. This work began four years ago, by supplying a few of the lumber camps with reading matter, and from this it quickly grew into a definite library and school system. From the lumber camps it spread to the mining and railway camps, in which the need is equally great.

The woodsmen at once showed their appreciation. A book or a paper was not only a messenger from the outside world, but it effectually relieved the monotony of the camp. Formerly there had been nothing for the winter evenings but story-telling, games, which often ended in gambling, or the woodsmen's fiddle, which not infrequently accompanied ribald songs. But now some of the men picked out from the library box a book or a paper to read. The camp became quieter, brighter, and cleaner.

To many of the men in the Ontario camps, however, the books and papers meant nothing. Of the fifty thousand, fully thirty-five per cent. can neither write nor read. So it came about that to the camp libraries were added schools of instruction. Classes were formed wherever a man was found capable and willing to teach grown-up pupils, and night-time in these camps became still more a contrast with its former idleness. Now, after four years, there is a staff of qualified teachers, and in twenty-five of the largest camps there are buildings set apart for reading and study. In the railway camps they took the form last summer of tents, which were moved as the line of construction advanced; in the lumber camps they are made of logs and boards, which may be used a second time when the camp moves to another field; while in the mining camps, which are more permanent, the reading-rooms are in some cases very creditable clubhouses. Some of the buildings have been provided by the lumber operators and mining companies at their own expense. Churches, young people's societies, and individual friends of the movement help to furnish and equip these reading-rooms. One Christian Endeavor society undertook to completely furnish a building with tables, books, pictures, games, and cottage organ. Books and papers also come from Sunday Schools, missionary societies, and from various sources in and out of the churches. One camp worker speaks of the usefulness of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which has been sent by a friend in an Ontario town. The larger camps have libraries of their own, but there are also a number of "traveling libraries," which pass on from one camp to another.

For the instruction classes, ten qualified teachers were employed last winter. Two of these were young medical doctors, two college graduates, and two undergraduates. Every man of the ten earned more than half his salary; the doctors practicing medicine in the camps, and the others acting as time-keepers or laborers. In the evenings, they conducted classes and supervised the reading-rooms. In one camp, six Frenchmen learned to read English, three boys learned to write, and a dozen mastered easy arithmetic; in another, such good progress was made, that the instructor started a class on Sundays.

There is another side to this work than the educational. The Reading Camp Association has paved the way for real Gospel work. The camps are open to the missionaries or clergy of any denomination, for services at any time. They are such services as one reads of in Ralph Connor's books—very simple, sometimes rough, always quaint; but often marked with real searching of heart, and followed by purer living. Sometimes the teachers and supervisors of the reading-rooms conduct the religious services, but usually these are left to the missionaries and visiting preachers.

The hard, relentless Gospel of work has been softened by the entrance and message of the Gospel of love. Ignorance, where ignorance leads quickly to spiritual darkness, is giving way to better things in head and heart. What it means to the men in the camps is beyond the telling; but without waiting to measure results, the work is going on and continually growing.

Mr. Nichols' Death in Tibet

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received from United States Minister Conger at Peking, China, the following cable dispatch confirming the reports of the death of Francis H. Nichols, the author and explorer, on the Tibetan border, as announced in last week's issue:

CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York: PEKING, Jan. 3.

A telegram just received reports Nichols' death at Gyantse. No particulars. (Signed) CONGER.

From other sources it is learned that Mr. Nichols (who was THE CHRISTIAN HERALD correspondent during the China famine three years ago, and rendered valuable service), left China via Burma, September 6, intending to proceed to Tibet. He had traveled as far as Gyantse on the frontier, when he succumbed to pneumonia, which he doubtless contracted in the intense cold of that bleak altitude. His grave is known only to the missionaries and a few natives, but his work will not soon be forgotten.

Nicer and Better Each Year

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Calendar and Mrs. Sangster's book, Good Manners for All Occasions, received, and I wish to write you how delighted I am with them. The Calendar is very sweet, and the book just what we might expect from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose premiums grow nicer and better each year, if possible. May God bless and prosper you continually in your great and glorious work. M. A. FARNHAM.

The Evacuation of Port Arthur

WHEN Port Arthur capitulated to the Japanese on the first day of the new year, the decision of Gen. Stoessel to end the gallant, but hopeless struggle, although it had long been expected by Gen. Nogi, came as a surprise to the entire Japanese army. New Year's is a national festival with the Japanese, but the bombardment was going on as furiously as ever, when a Russian officer bearing a peace flag appeared on the heights of Jentai, before the Japanese outposts, and asked for a parley. Even while the peace negotiations were in progress, the big guns continued to thunder, and at night the searchlights flashed across the hills, rocks and ravines, and showed the fighting to be still in progress. Nogi and his staff knew, however, that the end had come. While conference was taking place next morning, which resulted in the surrender, the guns were still roaring, and men were doing the bloody work of war, ignorant that the drama was about to close.

That peace conference which resulted in the surrender of the great fortress, and of some 48,000 Russians as prisoners of war, will pass into history. It took place at the village of Suisshi, about two miles from Port Arthur, a typical Chinese hamlet of scattered one-storied houses. The Russian and Japanese envoys met in a mean-looking thatched house with a compound at the rear. Two small windows had been filled with mud, and an opening had been made for a door. A crowd had gathered in the neighborhood. Two white flags, one carried by a Cossack and the other by a Japanese trooper, marked the spot where the eventful meeting was being held. The cavalry escort of the Russian commissioners had dismounted. The Cossack riders seemed to be in fine health and spirits, and their horses showed no traces of starvation.

On either side of a broad avenue leading to the house in which the commissioners were conferring, stood lines of Japanese soldiers, interested, but silent spectators of the scene of the great siege. Beyond this, there was no special military display. A solitary sentry walked back and forth at the entrance to the compound. Cordial courtesy marked the attitude and intercourse of the Russian and Japanese commissioners during the whole negotiations.

Briefly stated, the terms of capitulation finally arranged were, that the fortress, ships, arms, ammunition, military buildings, material, and other property of the Russian government should be surrendered; also the plans of the forts and the mines, and the military and naval officers' lists; the army and navy volunteers and other officials to be held as prisoners of war; army and naval officers and civil officials attached to be permitted to retain their arms, and to keep such private property as is essential to daily life and to return to Russia till the end of the war on parole, and not to take arms against Japan. Any Russian causing further damage or destruction to forts, batteries or ships after the capitulation agreement is signed, to be liable to punishment. It was agreed that Russian garrisons of the forts and batteries on Etseshan, Sungshushan, and Anteshan should be removed by noon January 3, and the forts handed over to the Japanese army. The Russian Sanitary Corps was to remain to care for the sick and wounded. A supplementary agreement was to be prepared later, regarding the treatment of the residents of Port Arthur and the transfer of municipal administration. It was assured that all private property would be respected. The agreement of capitulation outlined above was drawn up in duplicate and became effective immediately after being signed by the commissioners.

When the news that the surrender was an accomplished fact spread through the Japanese camp, Gen. Nogi was everywhere congratulated. Under the stress of the terrible months of siege and since the loss of his two sons in the war, the commander had aged considerably, but he looked ten years younger as he smilingly acknowledged the congratulations showered upon him.

Although the forts were little more than masses of ruins, the city of Port Arthur, when the victorious Japanese entered it, was found to be by no means as badly damaged by the bombardment as might have been expected. "Carriages and rickshaws," writes a correspondent, "were moving about with well-dressed people. There were no signs of starvation." There were thousands of Russians in hospitals, and proper food and medicines were greatly needed.

In all, nearly 48,000 Russians surrendered to Gen. Nogi. These included 32,000 prisoners of war (regular army and navy, volunteers and non-combatants), and 16,000 sick and wounded. There were 622 officers among the prisoners. The army furnished 22,500 of the whole and the navy 4,500. Only 5,451 men were capable of active service.

Generals Nogi and Stoessel met at a point known as Plum Tree, just before the Russian evacuation. They greeted each other cordially. Stoessel sympathized with Nogi on the loss of his two sons. He presented to the Japanese General the horse he rode—a fine Arabian battle-charger. When the Russian troops marched out of the fortress to the village of Yahuthwei, near Pigeon Bay, to be transported to Dalny, according to arrangement, the scene was a most impressive one. As regiment after regiment of the conquered marched past, they were saluted by the victors. This recognition of the bravery of the defenders was all the more cordial on the part of the Japanese, from the fact that the Mikado himself, in a cable message to Gen. Nogi, had warmly commended the valor of the Russians and directed that they be treated with the honors of war, as due to a brave foe.

According to the stories of eye-witnesses of the entry of the Japanese, the scenes that greeted them in the dismantled Port Arthur forts were appalling. Amid the heaps of debris lay scores of festering corpses. Near the parapets were heaps of what had once been brave soldiers, who had fallen at their posts, and lay unburied.

The Japanese found plenty of breadstuffs, but little other food in Port Arthur. They intend to restore the fortifications immediately. It is not yet known whether any of the sunken Russian warships can be raised. The harbor is now being cleared of mines, and will be guarded by Japanese cruisers and torpedo boats. Four Russian torpedo boats and a transport were permitted to escape from the port by the Japanese "as a tribute to the bravery of the garrison."

In Russia the fall of Port Arthur has produced a deep impression, and it is believed has greatly strengthened the movement for reforms in the government. Gen. Stoessel, the heroic defender of the fortress, will be subjected to a trial by court-martial, but as his brave defence has already been praised by the Czar, it is supposed the trial will be a mere formality. In losing Port Arthur, Russia by no means loses hope of the campaign in Manchuria. Nothing short of the actual outbreak of the long-expected revolution at home would force the Czar and his ministers to accept peace at this stage of the war, with Russian prestige so badly damaged. It is expected that Gen. Oyama will now be reinforced by a large part of the Japanese army of Gen. Nogi; but Russia will strain every point to increase Gen. Kouropatkin's army by sending him 200,000 additional troops so that he may assume the aggressive early next spring, provided, of course, the Japanese do not forestall this plan by pushing the campaign vigorously meanwhile. It is reported, unofficially, that the Czar and his ministers have reconsidered their orders to the Baltic fleet, and that Admirals Rojestvensky and Volkersahm will be instructed not to proceed to Chinese waters, but to remain at Madagascar until the third Baltic squadron is ready to join them. This, if confirmed, practically means that Russia has abandoned her naval campaign in the present war.

Japan, like Russia, does not look for an early peace, but is now girding herself for a vigorous continuance of the land campaign. Throughout the nation, the general feeling favors the permanent retention of Port Arthur as "the key to peace in the Far East."

After Port Arthur—What?

WITH the surrender of Port Arthur, filled with its dead and wounded, and the permanent retirement from the campaign of thousands of her bravest troops, Russia has undoubtedly suffered a blow to the national prestige which even the best efforts of her generals in Manchuria will hardly be able to neutralize. Abandoning the control of the sea to Japan—if it be true that the Baltic squadron has been halted indefinitely at Madagascar and its coal supplies stopped—the land campaign is now Russia's sole remaining hope. In that direction, the outlook is by no means encouraging. Winter will render transportation of troops and supplies a difficult task, and long before Gen. Kouropatkin gets his new levies from the west, the Japanese will be reinforced by the larger part of Gen. Nogi's victorious army and his heavy artillery. It will be surprising indeed if the next few weeks do not prove to be the most eventful of the whole Manchurian campaign.

Russian apathy over the loss of Port Arthur, the unpopularity of the war, and the growing discontent throughout the Czar's European empire, are now so evident, that even the strongest supporters of the bureaucracy are alarmed. There are ominous signs on every hand of a movement which may culminate in a new order of things in Russia. Since the Emperor revoked his original reform programme, and at the demand of the bureaucrats, gave the Zemstvos to understand that the government would sternly repress all popular agitation in favor of constitutional reform, the Russian people, instead of cowering under the rebuke as on former occasions, have taken new courage. They have found able advocates among the leading thinkers of the Empire and in the press. Persecution, the imprisonment or official degradation of eminent liberals, and the seizure of reform newspapers, have only served to add fuel to the flame. Never were the supporters of constitutional reform so ardent or so numerous as to-day. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Czar and his advisers should regard this formidable movement with a concern almost equal to that with which they view the perplexing problem in the Far East. At any moment it may suddenly expand, and become the vaster and more momentous problem of the two.

Thus, whichever way Russia turns, she is confronted by a dilemma that confounds her ablest statesmen and generals. Is there a solution? Is the way out to be found in the direction of increased repression at home, and diverting the national discontent by urging forward the war in Manchuria with redoubled energy at what ever cost? Or is the true solution to be found in the restoration of confidence between Emperor and people through the honorable redemption of the reform pledges, and by seizing the opportunity to terminate the war at the critical moment, when its natural climax has been reached? Beyond that point, the traditional "peace with honor" would be apt to become peace with disaster, deep and irretrievable—not for the Russian people, but for their bureaucratic rulers. It is their rapacity, their cruelty, their insensate love of power, and their blindness to the real nature of the great struggle now going on among the loyal, warm-hearted but despised millions of the Czar's subjects, that constitute the real danger to the Empire.

The Good of the Storm

THE housed and happy look out at the winter storm, sweeping wildly by the windows, and in sympathy exclaim: "What a night for the poor!" Hour after hour passes, and the snow, driven before a raging wind, heaps the streets and sidewalks in drifts, while intervening spaces are left as bare and dry as Mother Hubbard's cupboard shelves. Street cars are stalled, even the electric current is powerless in the face of tracks buried deep in snow. Pedestrians, with collars turned up and hats pulled down, face the stinging blast as the snow hardens, dashing in glassy particles that cut the skin almost like needle-points.

A terrible night for the poor, indeed, who have all they can do to keep alive even in ordinary winter weather. In the fireless homes of many of the unemployed, little children huddle together, shivering the long night through as they listen to the sleet against the panes, and between fitful snatches of slumber they wonder if morning will ever come.

As night wears on, the storm increases, but now the snow is whiter and softer, and the drifts pile higher. Everyone who can find shelter has sought it long ago; even a doorway is better than nothing during such a bitter cold night.

When morning dawns, with it comes the good of the storm. In every big city, from the metropolis down, an army of men with shovels attack the white invader; for walks must be cleared, car tracks unearthed, and the snow disposed of. All the city's regular force of cleaners ("White-wings," they call them in New York), with horses and other paraphernalia are pressed into service; but work as they may, they are most inadequate. When many miles of streets are cleaned in one day, it means work for many men, who toil day and night in relays, until the snow is all removed.

Thus, snow, while it means cold and suffering to some, means work and food to many thousands of the unemployed. In our large northern cities, any man who can wield a shovel stands a good chance of a job while the snow lasts. Nearly 12,000 shovellers were at work for days after a recent snowstorm in New York, and four thousand vehicles were in use in Manhattan alone. In Brooklyn, 4,500 men, and 1,500 carts were busy, while 600 men and 200 carts, wrestled with the snow in the Bronx district.

So it has come to pass that when the weather Bureau predicts a snowstorm for the vicinity of the over populated Metropolis, the poor man out of work plucks up courage, as he sees his way to earning enough to keep the wolf from the door for a while longer. Snowstorms may not be unmixed blessings, but they certainly have their good side for the poor of the large cities within the snow-belt of this country.

Dead, Yet Speaking

A LITTLE more than three-quarters of a century ago, the poet Shelley was drowned off the coast of Italy. His body was washed ashore a few miles north of Leghorn, and taken charge of by three of his friends Lord Byron, Leigh Hunt and Trelawny, afterwards his biographer. There on the sands by the blue Mediterranean was performed a strange pagan rite. Wood was gathered and built into a funeral pyre. The body was drawn from the sand that lay lightly over it and placed naked on the pyre. Wine and oil were then poured reverently upon it, which, dripping down, saturated the wood, and the fire was kindled. In a short time all that was mortal of Shelley was reduced to ashes. Yet not all. As these friends removed the smouldering embers and picked out the few pieces of charred and crumbly bone which the fire had left, a startling discovery was made. In that fierce heat, which consumed everything else, by some strange chance the heart remained entire!

So we, only after a Christian sort, commit our beloved dead, "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust," and, returning in loneliness and grief to weep over the vacant chair, we say: "Dead—gone—the last of my friend!" But how mistaken we are. How wide of the truth the kindly word of the undertaker, when he invited those who so desired, to approach the casket and "view the remains." Happy would it be for some men if their "remains" could be shut down under the lid of a coffin. But a blessed thing it is for others, and for the world, that it never can be so. There is something which will still remain, which the corruption of the grave cannot touch, which the fiercest flames could not consume. The remains of the flesh are there, and will soon be dust and ashes. But the man himself lives right on, not only in that world whither the immortal spirit flies, but here among men; his heart, his imperishable self, surviving and making its voice heard in other hearts, other imperishable selves, until the end of all things.

God be thanked that it is so; that those of us, whose lives in their lowliness and narrowness are of small account, whose voices now can reach but a very little way, and are often powerless where we fain would have them most effective, shall not go down into silent graves; that, being dead, we shall yet speak, and in other lives, whether near us or far down the years, our weakness may be strength at last.

The Progress of Church Federation

CHURCH federation has not sprung out of the thought of to-day or yesterday. Royal service in advancing the cause of Christian unity has marked the pages of our American church history for over half a century. The organization of the present National Federation of Churches was brought about by a conference held in New York early in the winter of 1900. Its main object has been "to secure co-operation among churches and Christian workers throughout the United States for the more effective promotion of the interests of the Kingdom of God." It came to its birth at an opportune time. With limited resources, it has brought about the organization of State Federations in New York, Ohio, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Michigan, and New Jersey; prepared the way in other States, and aided the work of organization in Maine, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and California. In some cases these federations have not gone much beyond bringing into official fellowship leaders in denominational activities, but in some States, a record of successful practical work has already been made. Local Federations that have been organized directly through the efforts of the national society, are, in many cases, proving that such a banding of Christian forces is the best means of expressing to the world their essential unity, and securing results that demand co-operative effort.

From 1902, increasing attention has been given to efforts, now crowned with success, that will bring together in the city of New York during the week of Nov. 15-20, 1905, the first great delegated Convention of representatives appointed by the action of the highest ecclesiastical assemblages or conferences of the leading denominations of our country. The following bodies have already responded favorably: The General Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, covering the entire country; the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, and also of the African and Zion M. E. Churches; the General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, and the United and Cumberland Presbyterian Churches; the Annual Convention (1904) of the Baptist Churches (North); the Annual Conference of the Free Baptists; the Convention of the Disciples held at Omaha (1902); the National Council of Congregational Churches; the Evangelical Association; the Christian Connection; the United Evangelical Church; the Synod of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, and the Moravian Church. Lutheran and other bodies holding their national meetings before the opening of the Convention will no doubt respond to the letter asking for the appointment of delegates, and it is hoped that the Protestant Episcopal Church will be represented through its "Commission on Christian Unity."

At the Convention of 1905, for the first time in the history of the Protestant Evangelical Churches in the United States, delegates representing denominations whose aggregate membership is over seventeen millions, will meet together for mutual counsel and federated action. The letter that has called together the messengers from these Churches that hold to Christ as the Head, says:

> We believe that the great Christian bodies in our country should stand together and lead in the discussion of, and give an impulse to all great movements that "make for righteousness." We believe that questions like that of the saloon; marriage and divorce; Sabbath desecration; the social evil; child labor; relation of labor to capital; the bettering of the conditions of the laboring classes; the moral and religious training of the young, the problem created by foreign immigration and international arbitration—indeed all great questions in which the voice of the Church should be heard—concern Christians of every name, and demand their united and concerted action, if the Church is to lead effectively in the conquest of the world for Christ. It is our conviction that there should be a closer union of the forces, and a more effective use of the resources of the Christian Churches in the different cities and towns, and when feasible, in other communities and fields, with a view to an increase of power and of results, in all Christian work.

The Convention will face the question: "Has not the time come to make this unity a more effective, practical power in advancing the interests of the Kingdom of God in every part of the land?" There are many who cherish the hope that this great gathering will devise some plan along simple lines that will create a permanent Council, which will open the way to secure federated action in every part of the country.

The New "Times" Building

SOARING high above all surrounding buildings, beautiful in its graceful symmetry, the new home of the New York Times deserves the eulogy pronounced upon it, of an architectural triumph. The city contains many tall and many beautiful edifices, but the two qualities have been united in this remarkable structure with extraordinary skill. It is not yet fully completed, and the builders are still busy on the final touches, but the Times could not wait for the closing work, and it took possession of its new habitation on January 2.

Figures give but an inadequate idea of the towering edifice, but in no other way can the facts be presented. In one sense it is the loftiest building in the city. Reckoning from the lowest floor of the basement to the top of the tower, it is over 419 feet in height. Fifty-seven feet are below the level of the street, affording space for the presses and other appliances connected with the mechanical production of the paper. From the Observatory on the roof the visitor looks down on the whole city. He stands higher than the torch of the Statue of Liberty in the Bay by one hundred feet, higher than the famous "Flatiron" building by seventy-two feet, and higher than the summit of the spire of Trinity Church by sixty-four feet. Only nine buildings in the whole world surpass it in height. These are the City Hall of Philadelphia; Cologne Cathedral; the Church of St. Nicholas, Hamburg; Strasburg Cathedral; St. Stephen's, Vienna; St. Peter's, Rome; Antwerp Cathedral; Freiburg Cathedral, and the Park Row Building in New York.

The original intention was to build the Times Building of the light limestone of which its basement is in fact composed. But it is undoubtedly a stroke of architectural good fortune that the change was made to the cream-white brick and terra cotta of the superstructure which has all the effectiveness of white marble, and adds a singular charm of color to a design which in any masonic material would have attained a distinguished and unqualified architectural success. The superstructure is carried by the steel columns, set seventeen feet apart, resting on bases of cast steel. The plate girder carrying the north wall is the heaviest ever used in building construction. It is five feet high and about three feet wide, and weighs thirty tons. It consists practically of three gigantic built-up I-beams The load transmitted through it to its two supporting columns has been estimated as 3,097,000 pounds. The building contains thirty-one stories, giving an aggregate floor space of 116,349 feet. The basement is occupied by the presses, which print not less than 144,000 sixteen-page papers an hour. Twenty-eight tons of plate glass have been used in the edifice. The number of red bricks required was 3,293,000, and there are over one hundred tons of plumbing.

The difficulty of erecting a building of a size so enormous was increased by the shape of the site. It is situated at the intersection of Broadway, with Forty-second and Forty-third Streets. Here, as at intervals due to the direction of Broadway, there is an irregular space of 143 feet on Broadway; 137 feet on Seventh Avenue; 58 on Forty-second Street, and 20 on Forty-third street. The architectural advantage of building on this peculiar site is one of complete detachment. This detachment carries with it the drawback of unusual costliness of building, since every side of the edifice is equally and conspicuously in evidence and must be a finished front, but with the compensation of an abundant and secure supply of air and light, secure in spite of what neighboring builders may afterward do.

That so enormous a building, with such extensive and elaborate appliances, is needed for the production of a great daily newspaper, is probably not realized by many of the people who buy and read it. More necessary even than these, are the skill and ability of its editors and contributors. They need to be ever on the alert, and, like the watchman set by the ancient prophet, they may say:

I stand continually upon the watchtower in the daytime, and I am set in my ward whole nights (Isa. 21: 8).

The Loftiest Newspaper Building in the World

In a Leopard's Grip

A small boy in New York was near losing his life, a few days ago, by the ferocity of a leopard. A dealer in wild animals whose store is on Grand Street, imported recently through a dealer in Germany, two large leopards, which he expected to sell to a menagerie. He kept them in the store, and finding that one of them was vicious, he built a wooden barricade in front of its cage, to keep people beyond reach of its claws. One day last week a boy of ten years of age went to the store to purchase some birdseed. While the owner was getting it, the boy crept under the barricade to look at the pretty spotted animals. Instantly the leopard's foot was thrust through the iron bars, and the boy was caught by the arm. The leopard drew him nearer the cage, and with the other foot grasped his shoulder. The boy screamed, and the owner ran to his rescue, picking up an iron bar on his way. With this he struck the leopard over the head, but it held on to the boy. Then he struck it over the back of the claw and it relaxed its hold. He dragged the boy loose from the other claw and pulled him away from the cage. His flesh is badly lacerated, but the doctors at the hospital to which he was sent, think he may recover if blood-poisoning does not set in. It may be hoped that the poor child will not lose his life. There are many who heedlessly venture into the clutches of a still more dangerous enemy, who lose their souls through their temerity.

Be sober, be vigilant: because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour (I. Peter 5: 8).

A Miser's Hoard

A press dispatch from Burlington, N.J., describes the amazement of the citizens at a discovery which has followed the death of an eccentric citizen. He had been a recluse for over twenty years, and was believed to be in extreme poverty. It was known, however, that he owned the house in which he lived, but neither in banks nor in investments was it supposed he had any money. With a single woman, who acted as his housekeeper, and was believed to be a distant relative, he lived alone, and had no friends or visitors. After his death, in preparing for a sale by auction, a strange discovery was made. Stored in dusty recesses and out-of-the-way nooks, laid between the leaves of books, which were carelessly placed in unlocked receptacles, and hidden beneath the carpets which covered the floors in his home, much money has been found. In one instance a peck measure was found containing $1,700, and a wooden box held $2,500 in gold. A thin book, merely a pamphlet, contained between thirty-eight consecutive leaves thirty-eight $100 bills. Old clothing in various trunks and closets had been used as receptacles for money. He had hidden away in this manner, it is said, at least a quarter of a million dollars. It is sad to think of so much wealth that might have been of use in the world, being hoarded, of no benefit to the owner or to any one else.

There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt (Eccles. 5: 13).

A Disappointed Widow

The death of a citizen of Worcester, Mass., has been followed by a dispute about his property. A lady who lived in Providence, R. I., appeared in Worcester, and declared herself his widow. She said that more than twenty years ago, she and her husband separated, and she has not seen him since that time. A friend in Worcester who knew her husband, had notified her of his death, and she at once appeared to press her claim. In opposition there was a statement that the deceased man had represented himself as a divorced man, and on searching the records of the Worcester court, a decree was found. It was dated fifteen years ago, and recited that the applicant had produced evidence that his wife had deserted him, and there being no opposition, nor any appearance on the part of the wife, the decree had been granted. There must have been some trickery, otherwise the wife would have been notified that her husband was proceeding against her for divorce. As she had not heard of it, her disappointment at not inheriting his estate is natural. No such plea can be made by those who will be disappointed of their heavenly inheritance. There are many who, relying on a past experience, believe themselves members of the bride of Christ, yet are living worldly lives, performing none of the duties of Christians, and holding no communion with their Lord. These will be repudiated at the last.

If we say we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth (I. John 1: 6).

THE HEART OF THE WORLD

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF OPENING CHAPTERS

Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., of the aristocratic St. Cecilia Metropolitan Church, is a pastor with broad humanitarian views of life. He has found time amid the duties of his ministry to write a book, entitled, The Christian Socialist, which has just been published under the nom de plume of "Mark Burns." It excites a tremendous sensation. His secret of the authorship is known only to Miss Mildred Rodney, his betrothed, who has divined it. The book excites mingled praise and antagonism, and is the topic of the hour. The conservative element denounce it as dangerous to society. Judge Rodney is especially bitter. Next winter, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton is chosen as bishop. A distinguished audience assembles in St. Cecilia's, to witness the consecration. At the critical moment, the pastor makes an open avowal of the authorship of the offending book. Bishops, clerics, and audience are stricken dumb with amazement. His ecclesiastical career is regarded as ended. Miss Rodney, notwithstanding some parental opposition, consents to marry Stanton, and the two begin to face the world together bravely.

Meanwhile, a great strike is going on at Lenox, and Stanton is invited to address the Union men, by Bruce Harvey, their president. He advocates Christian love and forbearance, instead of violence, but the meeting is stampeded by the news of a riot at the mills. Stanton and Harvey go there with the crowd, but cannot preserve order. In the riot several are killed and many injured. Stanton rescues a poor negro worker from the furious mob, but is himself badly hurt in doing so. He and Harvey become fast friends. Harwood, and Wrightam are two millionaire mill-owners, whose hard and oppressive measures have embittered the workers. Stanton resolves to plead with them for a better understanding, as both are church members and professing Christians. He calls on Wrightam, but meets with a decided rebuff. With Harwood he has more success, and the two become good friends. Harwood has a great domestic sorrow, which takes the sweetness out of all his business triumphs. He leaves his wealthy home and friends, and disguised, goes to work as a mill hand.

Stanton meanwhile is becoming well known as an advocate of Christian Socialism, and is a frequent lecturer. He meets many queer characters among the workers, and much appreciation. The troubles at Lenox continue, and he arrives there one day just in time to find a mob about to burn a negro who is accused of murder. Stanton determines to thwart the lynchers, but is knocked senseless, and the negro is burned. Next day the real culprits are found, and the negro victim is shown to have been wholly innocent. There is a popular revulsion of feeling in favor of Stanton. On the following Sunday he preaches in one of the leading pulpits, by invitation, and takes the lynching for his topic. Some people in the audience take exception to certain remarks by the speaker, as unpatriotic, and there is a momentary interruption, during which many leave the hall. Stanton then quietly concludes his discourse. While visiting the Company's mill, Stanton witnesses a heroic act by a worker, who saves Harvey's life by imperiling his own. He recognizes the worker as Harwood,

CHAPTER VII

WHEN the men finally ran up and began to clear away the mass of broken, twisted machinery, they came first upon Harvey. One of his feet was crushed and held down by a piece of broken derrick arm, but the rest of his body was free, and, with the exception of a few bruises, he was not seriously injured, although he was unconscious.

The foreman noted the details of the accident with a cool shrewdness that was not disturbed by so common a thing as an accident.

"He was pushed over this way. Lucky for him that he was. Now the other fellow——"

The workmen, under his directions, lifted off broken masses of metal until, after half an hour's careful work, the crushed and crippled form of Harwood was uncovered.

Grimy but tender hands lifted him into the ambulance which had been summoned, and had been waiting. The foreman hesitated a moment about sending Harvey over to the Company Hospital; but the attendant who had come down with the ambulance, brought word that the doctor had sent an order for Harvey to be taken to the hospital. So the two bodies, both unconscious, were placed into the vehicle, side by side.

Stanton, shocked almost to faintness by Harwood's condition, went up to the hospital as fast as he could walk, and was there when the two were brought into the accident ward. There was nothing he could do for Harwood, so he stayed by Harvey until he came to himself, after his foot had been dressed.

"Where am I?" he asked feebly, seeing Stanton by the bedside.

"You have been hurt a little. You are in the Company Hospital."

Just then the doctor come back into the ward, and spoke to Harvey.

"There's nothing the matter with you, old man, only you won't walk very good for a little while, and you got a fairly good crack on the head, but no bones broken. What I call a miracle."

He went on out into the corridor and Stanton stepped out there.

"How about Harwood?" he asked.

"Oh! Yes, the foreman told me, of course. A most remarkable affair, Dr. Stanton. I've telegraphed his boys to come on from Poughkeepsie. They can't get here until to-morrow night. It'll be too late."

"You don't mean——"

"He was crushed frightfully. It's a wonder he is alive. You can come in and see him."

Stanton went into the room where Harwood was lying. He was so terribly marred in the face that Stanton recoiled.

"It will not do any harm—a prayer——"

The doctor nodded assent gravely, and Stanton kneeled and prayed gently a few sentences. He was still on his knees when Harwood's lips moved.

Stanton leaned over him and caught a whisper.

"Tell my boys not to love money more than God—Leona—I would like to see my wife, you know——"

That was all Stanton could understand, and a few moments later Harwood passed into unconsciousness, and was in that same stupor when Stanton finally left the hospital and went home.

He went down again the next morning after breakfast.

The first person he saw in the corridor was J. B. Wrightam.

"This is a terrible affair, Dr. Stanton," Wrightam said, as Stanton entered.

"It certainly is, Brother Wrightam. How is the poor fellow this morning?"

"What! Have you not heard! He's gone! Only ten minutes ago!" Wrightam spoke in great agitation. "The doctor has asked me to meet the boys when they come in this evening on the 7.30 and break the news. I can't do it. Won't you do that, Dr. Stanton? You're more used to such things than I am."

"Yes, I'll meet them. Poor fellows!"

Stanton was deeply shocked by the news. But he had a whole lifetime of Christian faith to fall back upon. Wrightam, however, seemed smitten into a dazed condition. He walked up and down through the corridor.

"I've known Harwood since we were in college together. This is terrible. I had no idea he was down in the mills. What fool notion was that, anyhow!"

Wrightam burst out as if to prevent himself from an exhibition of some softer emotion. "He must have been out of his mind, don't you think, Mr Stanton?"

"No, I don't think so. I believe he was perfectly sane."

Wrightam stared and resumed his walk. Stanton asked one of the nurses passing through the hall about Harvey. Just then the doctor came out.

"Do you want to see Harwood?" he asked.

Stanton nodded and followed the doctor. Wrightam turned at the end of the hall, hesitated, and then came along, entering the room with them where Harwood lay, almost at the same time.

The lips had not been touched by the cruel iron that had put its disfiguring mark everywhere else, and Stanton thought of that as he went out, after an instant's stay. Wrightam stood at the foot of the bed, and big tears were rolling over his large, coarse face. Stanton felt strangely moved at the sight as Wrightam stood there.

He found Harvey sitting up in bed, already fast recovering strength. The man's remarkable physical vitality stood him in good stead.

"Tell me about the accident. I don't seem to remember how it happened," he said to Stanton, putting his hand up to his head.

"You're not able to talk about it."

"Yes, I am. The doctor says I can get out of here this week. I want to get away as soon as possible. We are reorganizing the Union, and I can't afford to be absent from the meetings."

"He does not inquire about Harwood," Stanton said to himself, shrinking from the disclosure that must inevitably come. "Evidently the doctor has not told him yet." And then he remembered a rule in the Company Hospital office, forbidding nurses or attendants talking to the patients about the other cases, or mentioning deaths in the hospital unless to relatives or friends.

"Well, when I entered the casting-room, you were standing under the 'Octopus' talking with the foreman. It looked to me as if you were having a quarrel."

"We were," Harvey replied grimly. "Wallace Macgregor called me a liar. I was going to hit him for that when the 'Octopus' hit me."

"Macgregor tried to pull you out from under. He reached for your arm as he sprung back."

"He did! Well, I would have done the same for him. But some one pushed me. Who was that?"

"One of the men."

"I got a pretty good crack on the skull, as the doctor said."

Harvey went on with the selfish indifference sometimes characteristic of him. "But if I once get out of here I'll soon have the Union in shape to dictate terms to Wrightam, Harwood & Co. By the way, I have not seen you since that time Bill Warren was burned at the stake, and forgot to ask you about your going to see Wrightam and Harwood, to talk with them about loving us trades-union fellows. I suppose you went. What sort of a time did you have?"

"Wrightam received me as I anticipated. I could not find any place in him to appeal to," Stanton answered, in a low tone.

"Of course not. Nor in Harwood, either. Of the two men, I prefer Wrightam. But Harwood is one of these proud, cold, aristocratic fellows, absolutely satisfied with his social position and without the slightest sense of the Brotherhood or——"

"Stop!" Stanton cried sternly. "Mr. Harwood is beyond your judgment or mine or that of your Union. He is in the presence of the God of all the earth, who will give him credit for the good you and I never saw."

"How!" What's that!" Harvey stammered.

"Mr. Harwood is here in the hospital, Harvey. He died here about an hour ago."

"Died here?"

"Yes, but before dying he saved a life."

"Saved a life!"

"Yours, Bruce Harvey. You would now be in his place if he had not done what he did yesterday."

"But I don't understand, Dr. Stanton. Tell me?"

Harvey sat up, and his dark, deep eyes glowed with great passion.

Stanton told him all that was necessary to let him know how Harwood came to be in Lenox lower mill as an operative. The narrative humbled and softened Harvey tremendously. Several times he interrupted to give expression to regret at his language about Harwood.

When Stanton was through, Harvey was silent a while. Then he burst out:

"I don't want to carry this responsibility of obligation around with me all my life. Why did he do it? I did not ask him to!"

"You cannot escape it now; it has occurred. Perhaps it will help to temper the judgment you have sometimes harshly passed on your fellow-men." Stanton said, as he rose to go.

"Don't leave me now," Harvey pleaded almost piteously. Stanton had never seen him so deeply shaken.

Stanton sat down. "Shall I pray?" he said.

"If you want to," replied Harvey, after a moment.

Stanton prayed earnestly. The tears stood in Harvey's eyes as he listened. When Stanton rose to go, Harvey said, "Thank you. Things seem mighty queer to me sometimes. I cannot understand Mr. Harwood's conduct. Life generally is a mix-up for me anyhow. I wish I had your faith in a good God over all."

"You can have it if you want it, Harvey."

Harvey shook his head doubtfully, and Stanton went out, wondering what the final result of that experience would be for the sombre labor leader.

He found Lenox stirred to keen excitement over Harwood's death. Everyone was talking about it. Some enterprising reporter had tracked down the facts about the separation of Harwood from his wife, and the Times that evening published a three-column sensational "story," half of which had no foundation in fact. The two facts of the separation of Harwood from his family, and of his working in Lenox lower mill, were, however, established beyond a doubt, as well as the fact that he had been killed in an attempt to save the life of Bruce Harvey, the President of the Labor Union. Whether he recognized Harvey before the accident no one ever knew. The one thing prominent in men's conversation all over Lenox and through the mills, was the fact that he had given his life in a brave effort to save another man, and there was not an operative in either mill that day who withheld his word of praise for the mill owner. Men's hearts were tender, their better feelings were stirred over the ent, and groups at the street corners all over the wn that day, stopped to question and answer as to Harwood's purpose in putting himself into the place an operative.

Stanton went down to the evening train to meet Harwood's two boys. They both broke down completely when they saw Stanton, and again when they nt up to the hospital. Two days later, after the neral service was over, the older of the boys, Arthur, ne to Stanton to get his advice as to the future.

Stanton was exceedingly interested in the boy. He s nineteen years old, and had his father's characteristics of feature and manner.

"I don't believe I can go back to the military hool," he said, in reply to a question. "Father's airs were in Mr. Wrightam's hands. His will has ovided liberally for Leona and Wallace and myself. feel the need of a college education, and I think I ght to go to Amherst. Father was an Amherst aduate, you know. He was planning, I think, to nd Wallace and me there this fall. When I get rough college, I would like to come into the mills in me way."

"In what way do you mean?" Stanton noted the ct that the boy had never once mentioned his mother's me.

"Well I hardly know. What would you advise me?"

"I don't know that I feel competent, y boy, to advise you until I know what u plan to make of yourself. The next ur years in college will settle some ings for you. Probably you will have t wait for some definite leading of od before you are sure of the future."

The boy's answer was a surprise to anton at first.

"I am pretty sure of what I want to , Dr. Stanton. I want to study the cial question from the workingman's w. I don't know enough yet, of urse. That is why I feel the need of college course. But when I am rough that, I am certain I shall want enter the mills, something as father d."

The boy's tone and manner recalled Stanton, Harwood's frank statements the night he called to tell him of his fe's desertion. Harwood had almost th passion, declared that it had been secret desire with him for years to get ar to the heart of the social problem, d that at heart he himself was in mpathy with the people. As Stanton oked at the boy, he could not help ying to himself, "blood is thicker than ater, and Harwood's son is simply giving expression to the real thing which nouldered in his father like a choking e, covered up by social usage and the appenings of wealth and tradition. In e boy, possibly this pent up fire would eak out and run over the crater's lip, own the mountain into the sea."

Stanton gave him good counsel, and he boy went to Amherst that fall, where, uring the next four years, Stanton kept p an interesting correspondence with m, and noted from time to time a most markable degree of progress in mental power and moral purpose. During is junior year, Arthur Harwood was undly converted, and became a devout hristian, but all that belongs to its wn place in this narrative, and without at event in the student's life, the vents that follow in this modest chronicle, could never have occurred.

Harvey's stay in the hospital led to an experiment which also had its significant bearing on the results of Stanton's labors and lectures.

He and Harvey had many earnest talks about the whole subject of labor and wealth and the relation of the Church to the whole question.

Harvey took the ground always that the Church was thoroughly useless institution, full of hypocrites, and that all ministers were parasites, doing no real labor and adding nothing to the increment of toil.

"How long is it since you were inside of a church, Harvey?" asked Stanton, after one of these discussions. Harvey had been out of the hospital for a week, and was beginning to organize the Union on a strong basis preparatory to making new demands on the mill company.

"I haven't been inside a church for over twenty years."

"And yet you pretend to judge the Church and the ministry without any real knowledge of their actual life. Would you consider it fair for me to judge your trade-union if I had never attended any of its meetings, never read any of its literature, and was absolutely ignorant of its daily programme?"

"No, of course not. I judge the Church in general by its fruits. I don't have to go to its services to see them."

"But what do you really know, Harvey, about the fruits, say of the Second Presbyterian Church here in Lenox?"

"Well"—Harvey hesitated. "I may not know much about it in detail. But I know one or two mighty mean men in the Second Presbyterian Church."

"I suppose there no mean men in the trade-unions?"

"You're wrong. There are a good many of them. But we don't pretend to be any better, and the church members do."

"Why don't you? Isn't it your business to be as good as church members? Have you any excuse for not being as good?"

"No excuse, perhaps; but we don't pretend."

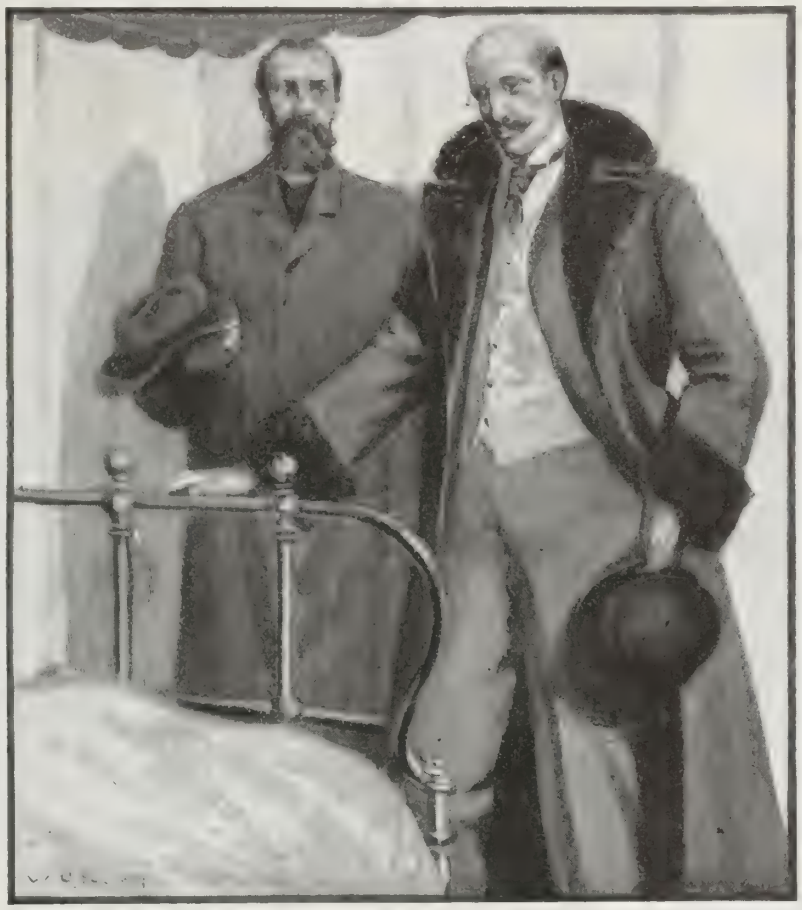
"No, your men are bad without pretending. I don't see much difference in the result, Harvey. But I do say you have no right to judge the Churches as you do without knowing them any better. A man who hasn't been to church for over twenty years is not in a position to know what a church is worth in the world."

"May be you're right," Harvey said good-naturedly. He was thinking of something that seemed to lighten up his dark face expressively.

"I'll go to church if you'll go with me," he said finally.

"I'll be glad to go. When?"

"I have a plan, Mr. Stanton. You said the other day you had purposed to be in Lenox three or four weeks to prepare material for your lectures. I'll go to church with you every Sunday and to prayer meetings as well. We'll visit as many churches as we can, as strangers, and I'll promise to keep my mind open, without prejudice, to judge of everything on its merits."



"WRIGHTAM STOOD . . . BIG TEARS ROLLING OVER HIS LARGE, COARSE FACE"

"But I'm too well-known here, Harvey, to attend church as a stranger."

"I don't know about that," Harvey answered. "It's been nearly two years since you left Saint Cecilia. You haven't been here half a dozen Sundays in that time. Saint Cecilia has a new man, and I heard you say the other day that you had not met him. If—if you shaved off your beard and wore glasses, I don't believe anyone would know you."

"Isn't that asking a good deal?" Stanton asked, laughing.

"May be, but I'd like to know what kind of a reception we would get going into the churches as total strangers."

"The thing has been tried several times. I don't know that I attach much value to it as a test. But I'm willing to try it," said Stanton, who was eager to win Harvey to a right thought of the Church. His assent to the little disguise of the glasses and the removal of his beard evidently pleased Harvey, and the next Sunday found them on their way together to the Second Presbyterian Church. They had both agreed to dress plainly but neatly, and might have passed for almost any kind of trade or business men.

One of the ushers in the vestibule met them courteously, and escorted them to good seats about half-way down the aisle. There did not happen to be any hymn-books in the rack, but as the congregation rose to sing, a woman sitting behind them handed each of them a book. When the service was over, they found the minister at the door shaking hands. He had never known Stanton intimately and Harvey not at all.

"Glad to see you," he said heartily. "Come again. Glad to see you at our prayer-meeting if you are in town this week." As they went out an usher, with a smile, handed each of them a leaflet with a list of church services for the week, and a printed invitation to attend as many of them as possible.

"Well, what did you think of it?" asked Stanton, glancing at Harvey quizzically, as they walked along.

"I don't mind saying I was surprised," said Harvey, who had listened and looked at everything in perfect silence. "But that was probably an exception. Has that man been preaching that sort of thing very long?"

"Well, I never heard Brother Wells preach before except at a Thanksgiving service. He gave a series one winter on the 'Rights of Man and the Rights of God.' What did you think of his sermon to-day?"

"It was good!" said Harvey emphatically. "It was full of horse-sense. And it got down to man's needs. Say, I don't see why more workingmen don't go to hear Mr. Wells."

"There were a good many men there. There is where you men, Harvey, make a great mistake. You sneer at the Church, and say it is for women and girls and children. The great bulk of all the church members in our most useful churches are wage-earners, clerks, and small salaried men."

"Well, the sermon was all right. I'll concede that. And the rest of the service was good enough. But I expect the second Presbyterian is an exception in Lenox."

In the evening they went to Saint Cecilia, as Stanton felt he might escape notice better than if they went in the daytime.

The beautiful church was about half full when they were shown to a pew by a well-dressed usher, who treated them courteously, and handed each of them a programme of the evening service.

There was an organ voluntary, a responsive reading, an anthem (Ave Maria), another anthem following the offering, two hymns, a prayer, a Bible reading, a sermon, and another selection by the quartette, with an organ postlude.

The minister preached about the Temple Service in Solomon's time, and dwelt at length on the stately ritual, emphasizing its value to the worshiper as an outward means of educating his religious senses and putting him in the proper mood for repentance, communion and awe.

As they came out of the vestibule, Stanton was crowded against one of his old parishioners, who turned to apologize, and in the instant, as they went down the steps, recognized his former pastor, in spite of the beardless face and the eye-glasses.

Stanton quietly introduced Harvey, and at the foot of the steps took the parishioner's arm and walked with him a little ways, explaining frankly the experiment he and Harvey were making, asking that their plan be respected and not disclosed to anyone. When they parted from the member of Saint Cecilia, Harvey, who had been repressing his feelings, broke out in a savage tirade at all he had seen and heard.

"That's what I mean by saying the Church is a useless appendix to society. Bah! How much Gospel was there for men like those you and I know in the mills, in that sermon? I'll admit it was all very refined and velvety. Brother Sayers is warranted not to offend anybody's delicate taste, that would be dreadful, of course. And when the plates are passed by men like Cummings, the great Trust promoter, it is the climax of all you can desire. I thought Cummings recognized me, he looked hard enough; but luckily I've lost so much flesh owing to my accident, he didn't know anything. I put a nickel into the plate, to support the Gospel as it is not preached in Saint Cecilia."

Stanton walked along in painful silence. His heart had been sore as he sat in a pew in his old church that night, and allowed memory to do its work. There had been some godly people in that church. There were some yet. But as he had sat there noting the display of wealth and ostentation in the house of God his heart sank, and a wave of bitterness swept over him at the thought of the neglected childhood, the desperate condition of the crowded slums down by the river, the open and flaunting institutions of gambling and vice and drink that festered and rotted in one large part of Lenox, while these silk and satin clothed worshipers in the temple that cost half a million dollars, complacently threw God's money after dress and fashion and pleasure.

The Power of an Endless Life

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

SEVENTEEN personal interviews of single inquirers with Christ, are recorded in the Gospel of John. All of the seventeen needed a Christian life. Nicodemus was the most distinguished of the seventeen, because he was "a master in Israel," a "ruler of the Jews," one of the seventy elders of the Sanhedrin. He was also the most timid of the seventeen, coming by night to visit the despised Jesus, whom, for fear of ridicule or condemnation by his fellow Pharisees, he did not dare to visit in the daytime. But even so, it was a most compromising step for a man in his position to take.

He has acquainted himself with the place of Christ's temporary abode in Jerusalem. He knows that he must be occupying the guest chamber on the roof. He seeks the outside stairway by which it is reached. We see him ascending the stairway, somewhat impeded by his long robe, the kittuna, which reaches almost to his ankles, and is bound by a girdle about his waist. He draws up his garment through his girdle to make his way easier. Over this he wears a long, shawl-like garment with borders of blue, and blue and white fringes at the corners. It is the tallith. His face is partially concealed by having drawn over it the maaphoreth, the white kerchief or havelock, which hangs from his sudar or turban. His feet are protected with loose-fitting sandals. The house is low, and the stairway short, so that he soon stands at the door of the aliyeh where Jesus is. He does not need to announce himself, for Jesus knows him by sight and by reputation. In the language of Edersheim: "Jesus is not elated by the possibility of making such a convert as a member of the great Sanhedrin. There is no excitement, no undue deference, nor eager politenesss; no compromise, nor attempted persuasiveness; not even accommodation. Nor, on the other hand, is there assumed superiority, irony, or dogmatism. All is calm, earnest, dignified."

Nicodemus lays aside his sandals and outer garments, and is seated on the floor mat, facing Jesus. By his very first remark, Nicodemus shows himself to have been a close observer of Jesus. "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God, for no man can do the signs that thou doest, except God be with him." Jesus answers the question that is in Nicodemus' thought by saying: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born anew, he can not see the kingdom of God." Nicodemus is mystified, for he can not see how it is possible for a full grown man to become a new born babe. He remembers that a Jewish proselyte—a gentile turned Jew, is said to be born anew. "But I am a Jew already," he is saying to himself. He looks inquiringly at Jesus, who replies: "Verily, verily I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God." Nicodemus' whole mien shows that he has no knowledge of what Jesus means by "the Spirit." Jesus tries to explain, by comparing the Spirit with the wind, but Nicodemus only replies: "How can these things be?"

The great man is as teachable as a child. Jesus recalls something which Nicodemus knows: the story of the Israelites who were bitten by the fiery serpents, and healed by looking at the brazen serpent, which God commanded Moses to set up. And Jesus says to Nicodemus: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him, may have eternal life." Light is beginning to dawn on the soul of Nicodemus, and Jesus goes on still further to tell him of eternal life, sent by a loving heavenly Father, through him, to all who will believe on his name. Nicodemus does believe. He was almost a believer when he sought the interview with Jesus.

Nicodemus has gained courage, and will not steal away to Jesus any more under the cover of darkness. He will go in the daylight. The accusations of his fellow Pharisees cause him no shame, no terror. He is prepared to defend the Christ if need be. He does defend him, when it is claimed in the Sanhedrin that the teachings of Jesus are misleading the people, and when they would condemn Jesus without a trial, Nicodemus asks: "Does our law judge a man, except it first hear from himself, and know what he doeth?" And they taunt him: "Art thou also of Galilee?" (John 7: 50).

Again Nicodemus shows his courage to be counted among the friends of Jesus, when he came to assist in placing him in the tomb after the Jews had crucified him, bringing with him one hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes to be used in the sepulturing. He had indeed been born anew.

Illustration and Application

The whole sermon of Jesus to that audience of one, is our lesson to-day, and its two great texts are: "Ye must be born again," and "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son," presenting conversion, atonement; man's sinfulness, God's grace; the insufficiency of natural life, the offer of spiritual life.

THAT I MAY BE CONVERTED

What has God done? Heb. 9: 13 — The Father? (v. 16); The Son? (v. 11); The Holy Spirit? (v. 6)

What must I do? (v. 15) When?

"Ye must be born again." That "must" is profoundly significant. So is the kindred word, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." (See also Rom. 8: 7, 8; Heb. 11: 6; James 3: 12.) These are kindred to that saying of God, "He can not deny himself," and that other "must," "Every man must give account of himself to God." All these are can nots of character. They are translations of a word indicating moral necessity, as contrasted with arbitrary action. They remind us that religion is not made up of arbitrary commands, but is a revelation of what is necessary from the very nature of things. As a man, however learned, must have, besides the natural ear, "a musical ear," to understand the deeper meanings and melodies of music, so a man, however learned, must have "the spiritual ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." God can not deny himself, that is, a just God can not treat an unjust man as if he were just, and an impenitent man as if he were penitent, and so "every man must give account of himself to God." (See also Luke 16: 26; John 8: 21; Rev. 14: 3; Acts 4: 12). But as a just judge can accept the fine paid by a friend, accompanied by evidence that the friend's act has prompted repentance and reform in the guilty, so the guilty need not "perish" because God's love in the gift of Christ has satisfied the law and changed the sinner.

That Christ said, "Ye must be born again" to one who was "well born" socially, intellectually, morally, religiously, and was also in a high religious office, kindred to being a bishop or permanent clerk of the General Assembly or General Conference, indicates very clearly that all, whatever their birth or rank or position or character, must receive, in addition to the natural powers, "the gift of eternal life," that is, spiritual life, which is as deathless as God, who gives it.

For the learned Nicodemus of to-day in some of our Bible classes, who says of conversion, "How can these things be?" here is a great word, expressed in terms of the newest philosophy, and based on scientific studies of modern conversions, from Varieties of Religious Experience, by Prof. Wm. James, of Harvard University: "God is the natural appellation, for us Christians at least, for the supreme reality, so I will call this higher part of the universe by the name of God. God and we have business with each other; and in opening ourselves to his influence our deepest destiny is fulfilled. The universe, at those parts of it which our personal being constitutes, takes a turn genuinely for the worse or for the better, in proportion as each one of us fulfils or evades God's commands."

How the life of Christ comes into the soul is clearly shown in many passages, most of which represent conversion, not as a convulsive revolution, but as a quiet dawning of a new day, a silent inflowing of a heavenly tide. In some passages we are bidden to "seek," to "come," to "knock," but if our faith is too faint for such efforts, we may at least "receive" him who seeks us and knocks at our heart's door. "As many as received him to them gave he power to become the sons of God" (John 1: 12). To most of the apostles, receiving him was but obeying his command, "Follow me." "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (I. John 1; 8). That is "the washing of regeneration," which God covenants to add to forgiveness on the simple condition that we "confess our sins" which implies a purpose to forsake them also. The writer has found no text more helpful to inquirers than the last quoted. It is so simple that any child can take it in. We know we are forgiven and converted, if we know we have confessed and resolved to forsake our sins.

Assurance rests not on our "feelings," but on God's contract. As the boy of ten, we have before quoted, said to doubting elders, who asked if he "hoped his sins were forgiven." "I know God has forgiven them, because he said he would." It is believing, that sure word of God, that brings peace and joy.

There is no Scripture warrant for treating children in Christian homes, who wish to be Christians, and to join with Christians in the fellowship and sacraments of the Church, as if they were Pharisees, needing such a revolutionary conversion as Saul of Tarsus, in whom the wrong teaching of half a lifetime must be overthrown. Let us teach children rather when they first come to know right and wrong, that it is their duty and privilege to decide that they will "follow light and do the right," by the help of Christ.

In one of the Western States lived a little girl named Annie Gale. She was led to receive Christ as her Saviour. One day, a friend said to her father: "It's all nonsense for your Annie to think she has been converted. She was just like a little angel always. I don't believe in religion making her any better: she was good enough before. If Dan Hunter could be turned round and made a Christian of, I'd believe in it." Annie heard the conversation, and her heart beat with pity for poor Dan. She knew him to be one of the worst characters. She went to his wretched dwelling, and began to talk to him in tender tones about Jesus, and God's love to the chief of sinners. After referring to her own conversion, she asked him if he was not a sinner, and if he did not need the same Saviour whom she had found? Poor Dan's heart was touched He wept, and fell upon his knees and cried out: "Lord ha' mercy on the worst of sinners." God heard that earnest, penitent cry, and left the old man praising the mercy which could save a wretch like him. It was Dan's business now to tell the story of God's love. He would say: "It's the same Gospel, the very same Gospel that so blessed little Annie Gale. You wouldn't think it could be—such a dreadful sinner as I've been!"

"Here," said Moody, in an inquiry meeting, "is one who represents a large class to be found everywhere, who can't be satisfied with anything you can tell them. They admit all that you wish them to admit about Christ, and you have reason to believe that they are God's children, but they look for something more. I generally dismiss them, but I give them John 3: 36: 'He that believeth on the Son, hath everlasting life.'"

The Day After the Party

YOU know how it is when you are going to have a party. The house is full of a very pleasant stir and bustle, and the rooms are all swept and dusted, he brasses are burnished and the windows are polished. 'he nicest dishes are made ready in the pantry, and the urtains are done over in the bed-rooms. When I was child, the odor of plum cake always suggested a party, nd it was pure delight to be allowed to assist in the reparations, to get out the finest napery, and the pretti- st cups and saucers, then finally to see my mother put n her best gown, and to be dressed myself in my Sab- ath-day bib and tucker. There was a breathless half- our of anticipation, when everybody was sitting up, very raight and dignified, in the lighted parlor, with a bright re in the grate, waiting for the party to arrive. Some- mes the friends came all at once. Sometimes they came y ones and twos. I recall an instance of intense morti- cation when, as a timid young irl, I went to a party myself nd, unfortunately, reached the ouse too early. "There's M—," overheard somebody say. Why on earth has she come so oon?" When my hostess rushed , smiling and gracious, I felt clined to run away, for I ncied her welcome a hollow am. Bashful self-consciousness oils anybody's pleasure at a rty or anywhere else.

The little pause of waiting is cceeded by the gay sallies and erry repartees of the guests, ho bring good spirits with them, nd are expecting to have a heerful evening. In this they e not disappointed. Given a enial host and hostess, cordial ords of greeting, guests who now one another and have quaintances in common, a rty is sure to be a success. here may be games, or music, talk, and there should be re- eshments; on a cold night mething hot for supper; on a arm evening something cold. the guests linger late and are luctant to go, it is a sign that ey are pleased with their en- rtainment, and that they will glad to come again.

Perhaps the party is that most harming of affairs, a home wed- ng. The bride, in her white own and veil, standing beside r proud bridegroom, has re- ived the heartiest good wishes her friends. Everyone has en radiantly happy. Even the ride's mother, who has felt that e might be tearful if she gave ay, has been resolutely brave nd bright. After awhile the bride goes to change her ess. She throws her bouquet to the young people low as she disappears up the stairs. She returns in r going-away gown and hat, good-byes are exchanged, nd she has left her childhood's home and ended one apter in her life, before any one else is ready to take ave. But when the bride goes, the party soon breaks p, and the family, left alone, go silently, one by one, bed. The day after that party is apt to be spent in e minor key, with little laughter and few songs.

The day after any party is a trifle flat. Reaction fol- ws excitement; yesterday was so roseate; to-day, hich is the to-morrow of yesterday, is almost certain to e gray, if not slate-color. The disordered rooms are be cleared up. The fragments of the feast constitute e family luncheon. Remainder biscuit are good, to e sure, but they have a flavor of festivity past, which is ss spicy than that of festivity to come.

Still it is very weak and silly to sit down and cry hen the party is over. Why not be glad that we have had it? Why not follow in fancy the comments our friends are making on it to-day? Why not run in on somebody who could not come, and tell her all about it.

I am sure that one never gets the full good of a party until one receives the return-echoes of a pleasure. The people who pay the party calls prolong the enjoyment of the occasion. And then, if they give a party, the fun of going to it is ours.

Her Ladyship's Gown of Fur

A lady of New York has had fashioned for herself an elegant gown of squirrel fur. It fits her to perfection. The soft, rich gray coats of the little animals that spend their beautiful free lives under the skies and in the forest boughs, showing no seam or roughness where they are joined to suit the lady's lissome figure. But a great many happy little lives were ruthlessly sacrificed to make this costly and unique garment. One wonders sometimes that gentle women are not haunted wherever they go by the ghosts of the poor creatures whose career in the sunlight is cut short that the queens of society may be robed as never queens nor princesses were in any preceding age.

THE TANGLED SKEIN

Winding so patiently, holding so still, loosing the tangles with sweetness and skill,
Dear little children, life's lessons you learn, lessons to help you wherever you turn.
Oft shall the tangles disturb you, and yet, this be the thought you need never forget;
Patience and love, and the word persevere, conquer all foes, even tangles don't fear.

An Old Folk's Rally

Every autumn, at Vineland, New Jersey, they have a rally of the old folk, with all the dear people from seventy to ninety as the chief actors on the occasion. A jolly time they have, for the old people have learned how to get the best out of life and they are wise in counsel and cheery in behavior.

At this Vineland celebration there were a hundred young people over fifty, who really could not be counted as old, and sixty who were beyond seventy, and sixty more who had passed eighty, while two hale old gentlemen were on the further side of ninety. One of these still does a day's work on his shoemaker's bench. In a Massachusetts town, there is a bank president who goes daily to business at ninety-three, and probably up and down our country there are many more whom old age has not laid on the shelf.

Home Nursing

NOTWITHSTANDING the fact that the trained nurse has become a very familiar figure, and that in cases of critical illness, or prolonged fever, her presence is very necessary. There are many cases of illness which must be cared for in the home itself, and by the home people. In the very beginning of an illness, it is wonderful how much may be done by an efficient mother, who understands how to administer simple home remedies. Hundreds of people cannot afford the luxury of a nurse, unless the danger is extreme. Long before the days of the trained nurse, there was good home nursing, and I well remember an old-fashioned doctor who said, that for his part, he preferred a sensible, unofficial woman, to one who had a diploma and had passed an examination. With this dictum of the doctor few now agree, for training is valuable wherever we find it. Some things which the trained nurse does, any woman may, however, do, if only she knows how. For instance, we will suppose there is a bed to be made.

"To arrange a bed for a sick person so that it will be thoroughly comfortable and free from wrinkles, the under sheet must be drawn very smoothly and well tucked in. If the patient is heavy or inclined to restlessness, you will find it of great advantage to pin the under sheet at the four corners with safety pins. In putting on the upper sheet, leave a good margin turned over at the top to cover the blanket. Instead of a heavy white spread, place over the blanket another sheet or a dimity counterpane. Three points to be observed about a sick bed are perfect cleanliness, no crumbs and no wrinkles."

It is a mistake of the home nurse to fidget and worry lest the patient is not getting enough to eat. When necessary, the physician arranges the kind and amount of nourishment required, and it must then be quietly given at the right moment. Even if the patient is reluctant it is well to bring the cup and spoon when the hour arrives and gently insist that the nourishment be taken. A patient who is convalescent should not be worried by questions as to what he or she would like to eat. The better way is to make every meal a pleasant surprise. If an open fire is in the room, do not put fuel upon it noisily, but have the pieces of coal that are to be dropped upon it wrapped in bits of paper. Ventilation is very important, but no sick person should be left in a draught. Protect the bed by a screen, put an extra blanket over the patient and open the window, top and bottom, for a very few moments.

In homes where there is room enough, it is a good plan to have a room set apart for illness. People who live in the country may do this, just as schools reserve a hospital room for pupils who may be ill. In our crowded city quarters such reservation would be almost impossible. One mistake made by the home nurse is to allow too many visitors to come in the sick room and talk with the patient. A rise of temperature in fever is sure to follow too many callers, and if a patient is weak and exhausted, there is no chance of strength being gained if vitality is expended in entertaining kind friends who come in.

RELIGIOUS WORK IN COLLEGES

By HARRY STEELE MORRISON

THE CHAPEL AT YALE COLLEGE

IN the leading colleges and universities of America, more than 200,000 young men are being educated to take their place in the world's work. They are learning the history of the past ages, art, mathematics, literature, mechanics, the elements of all modern professions. What are they learning about the Christian religion?

It is coming to be recognized that the Church has a great duty to perform in bringing its principles before the educated youth of America. Thoughtful persons are inquiring, "What is the attitude of college students toward Christianity." They are also asking what the Church can do to win the allegiance of college students to Christ? On the other hand, the normal type of thoughtful youth is asking, what the Church has to offer him in the sense of intellectual satisfaction, and if the claims that it makes on his faith can be verified? He has a passion for reality. No effort of the Church can be more mistaken, than to attempt to win his allegiance by laying emphasis on ecclesiastical forms and ceremonies, and on the mere accessories and incidentals of religion. The average college student, while in many respects very immature, is quick to discern anything which seems to him of the nature of indirectness or unreality. He has a passion for reality. The first demand he makes of his companions or his teachers, is the demand for straightforwardness, sincerity, and simplicity. Undoubtedly the Church often fails in its mission to the student, because it imagines him to be frivolous and indifferent, when, in reality, he is tremendously in earnest, and passionately sincere.

JOHN R. MOTT

A great many persons imagine that the years from seventeen to twenty-two are not likely to be years of natural piety. The world, it is urged, is just making its appeal to the flesh and to the mind with overmastering power, while the experience of life has not yet created for itself a stable religion. Many years ago it was determined in Harvard University that religion should be no longer regarded as a part of the regular academic course, but should be offered to the students as a privilege and an opportunity. It was then argued by some that the system was sure to fail, because, by the very conditions of their growth, young men were not susceptible to religion. They had outgrown, it was urged, the religion of their childhood, and had not yet grown into the religion of their maturity.

But it did not fail. This voluntary system of religion applied to university life proved the essentially religious nature of the normal, educated young man of America, and showed that there was room for an organization which could afford these young men an opportunity for religious service. The Young Men's Christian Association has, on the one hand, satisfied the need, and the progress of the Christian student movement has given him the opportunity for its exercise. It has been one of the most inspiring developments of the last decade. To-day there are no less than 721 student organizations belonging to the movement. Of these, fifty-one are in theological colleges, three in law colleges, sixty-five in medical and dental colleges, 309 in university colleges of other faculties, 125 in normal, technological, military and naval colleges, and the remaining 168 are in academies and other preparatory schools. The membership numbers more than 47,000 students and professors. There are not less than 160,000 young men and boys in the institutions where organizations are found.

What are the main objects of this remarkable movement? The one great end, of course, is to lead young men to Christ. To accomplish this, regular devotional meetings are held two or three times a week in all the colleges. Classes for the study of the Bible meet at stated periods, and in some of the larger universities there are as many as twenty-five classes of this sort. One method is for a group of men to meet together in one of the student's rooms, for it is obviously impossible to accommodate as many as twenty-five groups in one building.

The year just passed has probably been the best hitherto witnessed in the number of conversions, especially in the South and West. The same factors have contributed to produce this result which have been most fruitful in former years. Among these are personal work by Christian students, and the increasing practice at all the colleges of personal devotional Bible study. Many universities have had special seasons of evangelistic effort, with meetings addressed by men whose character and knowledge of the needs of students have enabled them to reach college men. Deep spiritual awakenings have resulted, and large numbers of students have been won to Christ.

The number of students enrolled in Bible classes during the past year was 25,000, as compared with only 16,000 the year before. Bible circles are now being conducted in one hundred more colleges than a year ago. In twenty-two States and provinces of North America the enrollment is double what it was the preceding year. One of the most significant facts has been the extension of Bible classes among the college fraternities. At many institutions, one night a week is devoted to this work in the different fraternity club-houses, where many of the most influential students are taking an active interest in the work.

The Christian student movement is doing a grand work for missions. Two hundred and fifty entered upon foreign missionary work in the past year, and the number enrolled in missionary study has increased to 9,025, showing a greater increase than in any previous period. A total of $70,000 was contributed, through Christian student organizations, to home and foreign missions. A young people's missionary movement has been organized, which has the cordial support of the various missionary societies, and successful conferences of student leaders have been held.

The organization is endeavoring to induce young men of strong character to adopt the Christian ministry as a calling, and its influence in this direction is accomplishing excellent results.

The buildings occupied by the movement at the various universities are often among the most interesting and impressive on the campus. At Princeton, Yale and Harvard, the structures are beautifully equipped and furnished, and all the colleges are erecting buildings as fast as the money can be raised. There was never a time in the movement when so many buildings were in course of erection as now. At the University of Wisconsin, a handsome five-story structure is nearly completed. It will have the usual equipment of a Young Men's Christian Association building, including an auditorium, a smaller meeting-room, a missionary room, restaurant, barber shop, club rooms and dormitories. At the University of North Carolina, Mercer University, McGill University, the University of Illinois, and Oregon Agricultural College, buildings are under way.

The Christian student movement is not confined to America. In China and Korea there are thirty-six organizations, with a membership of 1,079; in France six, with nearly 300 members; in Holland seven, with 154 members; in Germany there are twenty-four organizations; in India forty, with about 3,000 members; in Japan fifty-one, with 1,500 members; in South Africa eighty, with 3,500 members. All over the world, wherever there are students, the work for Christ is going on; who can predict what the harvest may ultimately be? From the institutions of learning will come the men who are to exert a wide influence in the world, and how much of that influence will be for Christianity? It is safe to say that if the student movement continues to grow in strength, our universities will be Christian not only in name but in reality, and the world will possess men of the highest intellectuality, who are earnest, enthusiastic believers in the Gospel of the Cross.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

One of God's Weakest Disciples, Ohio. "I have always found great comfort and spiritual strength in prayer, and I have received many answers. I have always taken all my trouble to the dear Lord and he has never turned me away without a blessing.'

Mrs. R. G., New Jersey. "Having read the Answered Prayers, and being strengthened by them, I wish to acknowledge the answers to many prayers in times of trouble and distress, and I have learned from experience that it is good to trust in God alone."

A Life Subscriber. "I prayed earnestly for a long time for a dear orphan boy, who said he was nothing but a wreck, made so by the drink habit. I pleaded with him many a time, but this morning for the first time, he promised me he would never touch it again. Will all the Christians who read this pray that he may be enabled, by divine strength, to keep his promise."

Reader, North Carolina. "I always read the 'Answered Prayer' column. It makes my faith stronger and more implicit in our Heavenly Father. It assures me that it was not an accident that my spiritual, physical, and financial affairs turned out in the way that I wished them to do, because so many others would not testify to the same thing if it were not true that He does hear and answer our prayers. But we should not be blind to other peoples' interests, and ask what our conscience tells us is right and best for all, and ask for the blessings on our neighbors we ask for ourselves."

H. S. H., Pennsylvania. "I was in a most perplexing place—duty on one hand, desire on the other—and I earnestly prayed that God would answer me the question of which to yield to, and he graciously did. I hope others may be encouraged to do likewise."

Old Subscriber, New York. "I have been for many years a Christian worker, and have tried during that time to do the will of my Heavenly Father, but of late there has come upon me such a burden and anxiety that no matter how much I pray, I cannot allay the constant fears that beset me. As yet the answer has not come. I beseech all who may read this to pray that God will answer my prayer, for it is for the salvation of my son that I am praying."

Mrs. S. A. G., Wash., D. C. "The kind Heavenly Father has answered my prayer and restored my dear child to health again. Pray for me that I may live nearer to him day by day."

Lilly W.T., Medina, Tenn. "Will you let me add my name to the list of those who believe that God hears and answers prayer. He has answered me so many times that it fills my soul full of love to him when I remember his loving kindness."

M.A.M., Rockford, Ill. "I send this for the benefit of weak believers. We were in trouble and had no way to help ourselves. We pleaded the 50th Psalm, 15th verse; the Lord graciously heard and delivered us, and now we praise his holy name. We cannot distrust him while we live."

O. A., Massachusetts. "That the faith of some dear one may be strengthened, I want to acknowledge God's direct answer to prayer. We were in stress, oh so great, that I was prostrated by it, and your prayer column led me to take it to the dear Saviour in great faith, claiming the promise. I prayed day after day in great agony of spirit. At last the load was lifted, my strength returned, and I had the assurance that my prayer was to be answered. Pray on, dear ones, God will hear your prayer."

Miss J., Virginia. "The Lord has answered so many prayers for me, that I want to add my testimony. I believe he will always answer our prayers if it is for the best, and we ask in faith. I always read the 'Answered Prayers,' and my faith has been strengthened by them."

Mrs. W. A. E., Germantown, Ky. "Some of our family were prostrated on beds of affliction, and I prayed to the Lord to save us, and he heard my prayer and we recovered. I am a firm believer in prayer."

Mrs. H. S. B. "I can testify that God does hear and answer prayers. He has done so much for me and mine that I cannot praise him enough. I can say with the Psalmist 'In my distress I cried unto the Lord and he heard me.' I can say that it has been good for me that I have been afflicted."

A Gift for Prisoners

THE lot of inmates in our penal institutions to-day is greatly improved as compared with that of a few years ago. Through the kindly interest and permission of the wardens in many places, holidays are made occasions when the dull monotony of prison life is greatly brightened by special treats.

Ten years ago, Mr. Dwight L. Moody became interested in the welfare of prisoners, and took steps to raise funds to supply them with Bible and religious books. Continuing his policy, the Bible Institute Colportage Association of Chicago, laid plans early last fall to supply chaplains with enough books to give each prisoner under their care one book as a Christmas present. The volume selected was Moody's Anecdotes. Bound in a white cover, with a picture of the evangelist in the attitude of preaching printed on it in brown ink, it made a neat and appropriate gift-book.

GOSPEL WORK AMONG PRISONERS
A Scene in Grand Rapids' City Jail

The funds at the disposal of the Association enabled them to send out upwards of 8,000 volumes. These went to county and city jails, State schools for boys, State penitentiaries and workhouses, in no less than twenty-seven States, from Maine to California.

The value of such good reading cannot be overestimated. "I have heard so many speak appreciatingly of your books and the good they have received from them," wrote Chaplain Munro of the Tombs, New York City, "that in the great day to come many a soul will bless God for the Moody literature."

A man who has a long criminal career behind him and has served time in the penitentiary of seven States, besides jails and workhouses, and who to-day is a truly converted man, recently said to Superintendent W. V. Wheeler, of the City Rescue Mission, Indianapolis, Ind.: "Moody's Sermons and Anecdotes are read and sought after in the prisons of this country more than all the other religious books that come there put together."

The chaplain at Louisville, Ky., wrote, telling what a boon the books are in his work, "especially to the moonshiners in the ward I have under my special supervision. The 'shiners,' as they are called, after reading the books, show their appreciation by carefully packing them away with their other belongings, and when they go out, carry them home with them to their mountain friends. Numbers of these United States prisoners have in the past gone out professing conversion, some of them now and then writing back to me to express their love and gratitude, and to reassure us of their faithfulness to God. I sincerely believe the books have contributed much in every way."

Contributions for the D. L. Moody Prison Book Fund are needed, to send new supplies for the new prisoners who are constantly passing through these institutions. A prayer union has been formed to bind friends of the prisoners together in prayer and sympathy in their behalf. An attractive certificate is issued to members. Particulars may be obtained by writing to A. P. Fitt, Superintendent, 250 La Salle Avenue, Chicago.

City Evangelization*

AMONG all the fields of Gospel work, there is none that has so pressing a claim upon the churches as the evangelization of the cities. It is one of the most appalling sights of our time, that meets the eye on a Sunday morning, in a walk through the slums of a great city. There is such an utter disregard of God and his day, that one is amazed at the patience and forbearance of the Almighty. The churches are open, the bells are calling the people to worship, Christ's Gospel is being proclaimed by able and earnest men, yet people are living like heathen all around us. Some of them are workingmen, who say that working hard every day of the week, they need a day of rest. Others, are idle men, who have not that excuse, but are indifferent to the claims of religion, and are living simply for physical enjoyment. Some are openly and avowedly hostile to Christianity.

How can these people be attracted to Christ? It is a task of stupendous difficulty. The inexorable claims of life in the city, the necessity of being constantly keyed up to the condition in which alone a man can earn a living in the modern city, engross all his energies, and it is hard to win his attention to higher things. Yet the difficulty ought not to be a discouragement, but rather a cause for quickening the powers and stimulating the ingenuity. We may be sure that the blessing of God, on every effort put forth to save the lost of our cities, will be abundantly given. "Should not I spare Nineveh, that great city?" God asked of Jonah when he longed to see the destruction that he had predicted. God looks with pity on the aggregation of his creatures, and longs to see them turn to him.

The practical question resolves itself into methods. The first is to encourage and support the city evangelization societies, which could do so much more if they had more money. Then, every Church ought to have its own agents covering its neighborhood, and trying to reach the families near to it. Finally, every Christian ought to seek to reach the men whom he knows and can influence, to convince them that religion will make them happier and better in this world, as well as in that which is to come.

Lived More Than a Century

Samuel Wescott, who came to Wisconsin in 1846, and settled in the then wilds of Washington County, passed away in death on November 9, at the home of his son, H. H. Wescott, at Toledo, Ia. Mr. Wescott was born in Croton on the Hudson, February 12, 1802, and was at the time of his death about 103 years old. He came from good stock, tracing the name back to the thirteenth century, and early in the seventeenth century they came to this country and settled with the Pilgrim Fathers in Massachusetts. Samuel's older brother fought for the young life of the nation against England in the war of 1812. Ninety-seven years ago, Father Wescott saw Robert Fulton's first steamer go up the Hudson on its trial trip. He was married in 1826 to Miss Bethia Cuddeback. Six sons and one daughter were given them. Seventeen grandchildren and sixteen great grandchildren are now living. More than seventy years ago Mr. Wescott joined the Methodist Church, and his faith failed not as the years multiplied. The day before he died he was taken to the polls to vote. He has had opportunity to vote for President twenty one times. When he was born, all this territory west of the Mississippi River was French dominion.

Mrs. Eve Dean Barnum died on October 21, 1904, at Victoria, B. C., at the age of 100 years, 9 months and 29 days. Eve Dean was born in Somersetshire County, England, December 29, 1803; was joined in marriage to the Rev. James Arthur, who came as a missionary to Toronto, Canada; she accompanied him on this mission and they wrought faithfully together until the death of Mr. Arthur. She was married to Mr. D. W. Barnum, in Northrop County, Ontario, August 3, 1835, and again left a widow by the death of Mr. Barnum. Mrs. Barnum was a worker in the church since her early childhood, and her Christian life spans nearly a century.

One of the greatest annoyances the particular housekeeper finds in living in a smoky city is that the lustre of her furniture soon becomes dull and is lost in a smutty haze. A thick suds of Ivory Soap in lukewarm water and a soft cloth will make it bright again with small labor. Ordinary soaps are too harsh but the Ivory Soap is fitted for all such special uses, because it is pure and mild, yet effective.

The Great Revival in Wales

Evan Roberts, the Young Collier Revivalist and his Wonderful Work

THE evangelical religious revival in South Wales (already mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), continues to spread rapidly. Originating in Cardiganshire, where the young collier evangelist, Evan Roberts, had been staying, it has invaded Glamorganshire and Carmarthenshire. Aberdare, Trecynon and other places situated in the heart of Glamorganshire, are now being visited by Roberts. Remarkable scenes have been witnessed in districts where crowded meetings are nightly held. People give way to sobbing and wailing, and strong men prostrate themselves on the floor and benches, in agonized repentance for sin. At some of the local factories and coal-pits, men cease work to hold prayer meetings.

The religious revival meetings conducted by Mr. Roberts are attended by overflowing congregations, and are remarkable for the number of converts. There have been physical prostrations of penitents, as in the Ulster revival of 1859. What is remarkable about the services, is that each one is of a similar character—viz., spontaneous preaching, prayer, singing, and the reading of passages of Scripture by male and female members of the congregation. There is not a moment of suspense throughout the eight or nine hours' service. Similar meetings are being held at Ammanford, Llanelly, Gorseinon, Bridgend, Cardigan and Newquay.

Many interesting instances are told of the meetings. A woman who was recently a prominent figure in a police court case, asked: "Can so great a sinner as I be saved?" "Yes, certainly," said Mr. Roberts; "no sinner is too great to be saved." Having heard this, tears falling down her cheeks, she said aloud: "I have fallen as low as anyone, and He has saved me."

At midnight a well-known man rose in a meeting. "He is an atheist," was an observation which fell from many lips. "I have read books which taught me there was no God," said he; "but I shall not look at them any more, for I have burnt them all to-day."

At Loughor and Gorseinon the lives of hundreds of colliers and tinplate workers have been changed for the better. Ministers declare that a baptism of fire has descended upon the community, which will leave a permanent mark upon its future.

The entire population of Horeb, a small town, has been transformed into a praying multitude. Men and women have voluntarily come forward, knelt at the throne of grace, and moved crowded congregations by their earnest prayers. The saloons are deserted.

The revival spirit has reached North Wales, and the many districts are in the throes of an upheaval, the influence of which is spreading.

Rev. R. E. Williams, of Butte, Mont., sends to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD these interesting facts concerning the beginning of Evan Roberts' ministry:

"A Methodist minister, of the name of Joseph Jenkins, at Newquay, South Wales, addressed his people one Sunday evening upon the solemn fact that Christians were becoming more and more enslaved by the world. After the service he felt somewhat depressed, on account of his sermon meeting, as he thought, with so little response. After supper he retired to his study. A rap was heard at the door. It was a young lady under a deep conviction. She told him how she had been looking for him for the last hour. He asked her what ailed her. She told him she had come to realize that she was enslaved by the world. He told her there was but One who could liberate her. Having pointed her to Christ, he prayed with her, and so they parted. At the next church meeting he probed the members in vain for their experience. Suddenly this young lady stood up, testifying how she loved the Lord Jesus Christ.

EVAN ROBERTS
The Famous Welsh Evangelist

This caused quite a stir in the church. It proved to be the small beginning of a mighty awakening. The fire kindled soon spread, and reached Blaenanerch, where Mr. Evan Roberts — the most conspicuous among the present revivalists, realized a spiritual baptism, which caused him to leave his studies, in a preparatory Academy at Newcastle-Emlyn, to start the present campaign. He is but twenty-six years old, a blacksmith by trade, and of a very limited experience in spiritual work; but he is a chosen instrument, in God's hand, to do wonderful things. The Cardiff Times and South Wales Weekly News, in a recent issue, had this to say about him and the work: "The revival is still spreading. The missioner whose influence is mysterious, indefinable, yet irresistibly mighty, may, without irreverence, be likened to a spiritual torch-bearer. It needs but his boyish, buoyant presence; his simple, often crude, yet fascinating talk, and his forceful, impassioned prayers, to set ablaze every centre he visits; and the fire thus kindled continues to burn luminously and with fierce intensity long after he departs. Mark his steps: Newcastle-Emlyn to Loughor, Loughor to Trecynon, Trecynon to Pontycymer, Pontycymer to Bridgend, Bridgend to Pyle, Pyle to Abergwynfi — thence on to Abercynon. In each of these centres the revival is at white heat. Should his peregrinations continue with like effect, there is likely to be a serious dislocation of business throughout the entire coalfield." So full of interest and enthusiasm have some of the meetings proved, that they have lasted for nine hours. Hundreds have already been converted, and the young revivalist, out of the abundance of his faith, predicts that there will be 100,000 converts in Wales before this mission ends.

The moral tone of these communities has already been changed. Theatres lack patrons, and the saloons are almost forced to close. At one place, it is said, that where as many as three hundred used to come out from a certain saloon, at closing time, on a Saturday night, only five came out at the same time after the revival commenced. The wave has reached a number of places in North Wales.

MIGHT HAVE SAVED IT

A Lot of Trouble from Too Much Starchy Food

A little boy of eight years whose parent did not feed him on the right kind of food was always nervous and suffered from a weak condition of the stomach and bowels. Finally he was taken down with appendicitis, and after the operation the doctor, knowing that his intestinal digestion was very weak, put him on Grape-Nuts twice a day.

He rapidly recovered and about two months thereafter, his father states, "He has grown to be strong, muscular, and sleeps soundly, weighs 62 pounds, and his whole system is in a fine condition of health." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

It is plain that if he had been put on Grape-Nuts at an earlier period in his life, and kept from the use of foods that he could not digest he never would have had appendicitis. That disease is caused by undigested food decaying in the stomach and bowels, causing irritation and making for the growth of all kinds of microbes, setting up a diseased condition which is the active cause of appendicitis, and this is more marked with people who do not properly digest white bread.

Grape-Nuts is made of the selected part of wheat and barley and by the peculiar processes of the cooking at the factory, all of the starch is turned into sugar ready for immediate digestion and the more perfect nourishment of all parts of the body, particularly the brain and nerve centres.

New York's School of Philanthropy

PROBABLY no subject is more difficult to deal with wisely and thoroughly, than the duty of helping the needy. It has long been realized that the mere gift of money, except as a temporary means of meeting an emergency, is one of the most foolish and mischievous methods of helping the poor. To really help them, to render them permanent service, so that they may reach a position of independence, in which charitable gifts are not needed, is the object of intelligent philanthropy. To achieve this, demands thought, experience, and training. A systematic education is required by every person who consecrates his life to the noble cause of philanthropic service. Such an education is offered by the School of Philanthropy, established in New York.

Men and women who have labored in this field are now giving the students the benefit of their experience, showing them the best ways of doing work, how to avoid mistakes, and how they can distribute funds in a way to do the largest possible good. It is a wise and beneficent service, which will be helpful alike to benefactors and beneficiaries. We are glad to note that as a means of making it really effective the School has received an endowment of $250,000 from Mr. John S. Kennedy, who has thus added another benefaction to a cause he has otherwise devotedly served.

MR. ALEX JOHNSON MRS. A. G. SPENCER MR. E. T. DEVINE

DIRECTORS OF NEW YORK'S SCHOOL OF PHILANTHROPY

The course consists mainly in lectures and discussions. How large a field is covered may be seen from the list of subjects. It includes among others Dr. Edward T. Devine on "The Literature of Charity"; Frank Tucker on "The Financial Administration of Charitable Agencies"; Mary Vida Clark on "Public Charitable Institutions in New York State"; Kate Holladay Claghorn on "The Social Meaning of Immigration"; William H. Allen on "Social Aspects of Sanitary Work"; Lilian Brandt on "The Tubercul sis Problem"; Mary E. Richmond on "Investigation and Records"; Homer Folks on "The Care of Destitute and Delinquent Children"; Ada Eliot on "Probation Work for Girls and Women"; Mr. Tabor on "Boys' Clubs"; Mrs. Morse on "The Best Method of Dealing with Wayward Girls"; Mr. Speranza on "Italian Characteristics," and Mr. Johnson on "The Floating River-side People."

The morning is devoted to two lectures, followed by discussion and by answers to questions put by the students. In the afternoon the students, under the guidance of officers and agents of the Charity Organization Society, go out into the city to study the methods of investigation, and to acquire experience in the giving of aid to needy families. For students who propose taking up a special sphere of work, admission has been secured to asylums, homes, and reformatory institutions, that they may study the systems adopted respectively in each, and watch the effects on the inmates. It is safe to predict that in many a distant city, the philanthropic agencies will be glad when seeking a manager or a worker, to avail themselves of men and women who have gained so thorough a knowledge of their duties in New York's School of Philanthropy.

The School is an outgrowth of a Summer School which was held in 1898, when twenty-seven students were enrolled. The need of such instruction, and the benefit gained, were so clearly demonstrated that the permanent organization was effected, and last winter 156 persons availed themselves of the opportunity. In the winter course provision was made for, (1) those who were doing or expected to do institutional work; (2) those who were working or expected to work with the societies that have to do with the needy families in their homes; and (3) for volunteer workers. Although the course was announced only a short time, before it was actually begun there was a large registration of students, most of whom were engaged in practical work.

There is a double advantage in the work thus done: It gives the new, inexperienced worker specific training and puts him in possession of the accumulated experience of years of effort that have been expended in attempts to solve the problems he is taking up. On the other hand, it is an advantage to societies and institutions which need the services of skilled workers. Above all, it obviates the necessity of training the novice at the expense of the interests of the poor.

The Director and his associates may be consulted by mail, or by appointment, at the office of the Charity Organization Society, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.

Missionary Lessons*

WHO can tell what the heroism is of the men who have given their lives to the missionary cause? Who can measure the courage of their setting out, of their patient endeavor to win a hearing, of their hardships, their uncongenial surroundings, their separation from home and family and friends? Yet they labor on, and if they do not sink under the deadly climate, or fall under the fierce attacks of men whom they try to save, the day comes when souls are won and they taste the joy of victory. Like their Master, as they see the travail of their souls, they are satisfied.

One of the lessons of their lives is a call to service. If the Gospel is so precious to them, if the love of souls is so strong, that they endure so much willingly, to carry the good news to the heathen, how ought we to work for the salvation of the heathen around us! Their example ought to stir us up to vigorous effort, lest we be put to shame. Here is work so much easier, costing so much less of sacrifice, shall we neglect it, while the men at the front are proving their heroism? They would have the right to upbraid us for our laziness or indifference, if we neglect the work close at our hands. We are members, with them, of Christ's great army, shall not we, too, in our humble stations, prove our loyalty and share with them the joy and the glory of service in the Master's cause.

Another lesson is the duty of relieving them of sordid cares as to their financial support. Shall men so noble, so self-denying, so heroic, be stinted in their income? Little enough is it that they ask; little enough that the societies which send them out require, surely that little will be given willingly and ungrudgingly. If such men are willing to go on their heroic mission, the least we can do is to give them our liberal and hearty support.

A Jewish Rabbi's Plea for World-Peace

PEACE and good-will. Instead of peace we have war, instead of good-will, hatred and jealousy.

The great festival of Christianity has passed. The nations sang, "Glory to God, the Father of all," when swords dripped with the blood of his children! Organs pealed forth their anthems, while guns belched their thunder, telling the eternal hills that peace was a farce and good-will a lie!

I cannot speak in the name of Christianity, but I can, and do speak in the name of religion. Is it religion to remain passive in the presence of the heroism, suffering, and slaughter which call the world's attention to the hills and valleys of far-off Manchuria, and which may be repeated on the coast of Japan, now threatened by a mighty and hostile fleet? Passivity is a crime when action is needed. It is the duty of the pulpit to help to shape public opinion against the crime, curse, and cost of war. And because of the recent meeting to endorse the arbitration treaties of the United States, and because of this being the season when all sincere Christians will wish that peace and good-will shall this year be a reality, and not a horrible falsehood, I write upon this subject as a minister of religion, and I offer these three points for consideration:

1. International arbitration must be compulsory and not voluntary. If two men fight, police stop them by force. This is right and rational, for the public welfare demands it. The combatants are told they must not take the law into their own hands, that the courts of law are open to them, that the majesty of the law must be sustained, that might does not make right. If two nations fight, why shall not international police stop them by force, if necessary? Why may they take the law in their own hands? Why should there not be a court open them? Can might make right?

There should be a permanent Court of Arbitration. It should order combatants to cease fighting, and to take their grievances to court. If either resist, let the other nations combine to enforce obedience even at the cost of war, and to impose severe penalty upon the real offender. The more severe the penalty, the more merciful will it be to humanity in the long run. No offending nation will dare resist the mandate of the civilized world more than once. You will say that it will mean war to cure war. Yes, it will. But like can cure like, and such a war would mean peace for the world for many centuries.

2. Christianity is on trial at the bar of the world's judgment. It is either a force for good or it is not. It either stands for peace and good-will, or it does not. We were recently told that some thirty years ago, a Japanese commission was sent "to Europe to discover whether she would not improve her moral condition by becoming Christian." Her commissioners having investigated the state of Christendom, returned home and reported "that there was more virtue in Japan and that she had better remain un-Christian." Whether this be true or not, we can well imagine that Japan will pause before entering the temple of Christianity. For she is fighting over breach of treaty obligation, which affects besides herself powerful Christian nations, who stand by and let her do the fighting by which they will benefit. Never more than now is the time for religion to show its nobility, its power, its sincerity.

Both combatants in the Far East have gained the admiration of the world by sacrifices and by courage. The greater power is riven between war abroad and revolution at home. She needs all her energies, all her brains to shape her advance on the lines of freedom of conscience, freedom of person, freedom of speech, popular representation, education—a hundred ideals—dear to everyone who stands for them. If on some coming Sunday every preacher would speak upon the grave inconsistency of believing in peace and good-will and nevertheless allowing the horrible Eastern war to continue, then, perhaps, every congregation would be inspired to rise in its consciousness of sincerity, in its sense of righteousness, in its sense of religion, and call upon this great government to move to bring about compulsory arbitration. Then would the voice of the public nation make peace and good-will a reality, and not the vile mockery which Manchuria presents.

3. The permanent court of arbitration should be at Jerusalem and not at The Hague, and it should be on the lines of the Bible. Jerusalem is dear to all the great nations. It is sacred to three great religions and to three great branches of one of them, the Catholic, Protestant, and Greek churches. The Hague is not. Jerusalem is hallowed by myriad associations, the mere thought of which makes a myriad hearts leap. The Hague is not. The Zion Court would be in permanent session. The Hague Court is not, and it would seem it needs some special action, such as that recently taken by the President of this country, to be brought into active existence. Its faultiness is also evidenced by the hesitancy and stipulation of some of the Powers; by the fact that patriotism is not a dead sentiment, and therefore its members may be influenced by patriotic considerations, such as colonies, protectorates, commercial conditions, etc. The Zion or Jerusalem Court would mean the reinstitution of the Jewish State on Bible lines, which lines limit the State with well defined borders and allow no colonies and therefore no causes for clash with other Powers. Therefore the Jewish jurists who would be among the members of the international court, could have no patriotic bias, no international friendship, such as that which binds England with America, instead of Anglo-Saxon with Slav, no alliance such as binds in even unnatural alliance a France, which stands for everything noble and free, for liberty, fraternity and equality, with a Russia, which stands for the very converse.

To allow this new-born year to pass without every Christian congregation protesting against the awful Russo-Japanese war, without asking our government to take steps in concert with other Powers, and to insist upon stopping the carnage and suffering, will declare for all time the impotency of Christianity to inspire the Christian nations to make a stand for what it stands for—Peace and Good-will. Why shall Russia and Japan be allowed to stipulate that their present war shall not be discussed at the coming Hague Conference? It should be discussed. I make bold to say that the two contending parties should be summoned to the Bar of the World, the Hague Tribunal. The mighty voice of public opinion would compel them to obey.

I have merely touched upon the subject of the restoration of Palestine to the Hebrews. The time will come when the prophet's word will be fulfilled and the nations will bring the Hebrews "as an offering out of all nations," as the great prophet declares in his last chapter, which means as an atonement offering for all the persecution which they have suffered in the past lead-footed centuries. And the time will come when his other grand prophecy will be fulfilled—that at Zion will be the world's court of international arbitration.

Knocking Away the Props

"WASH" McLean, of Cincinnati, was, though a Catholic, a personal friend of "Bob" Ingersoll, as indeed was almost everybody who knew him well. He was seated in the Ebbitt House, Washington, one day, when Ingersoll came bustling in, glad and hearty in his greeting.

"Wish you'd been here a few moments ago, Bob," said McLean. "There was a veteran on his crutch outside on the pavement talking away with some old comrades, apparently about the flag and the 'cause,' when along came a young fellow, who was either mean or careless, for he kicked the old fellow's crutch out from him, and down he went. He hurt himself so badly, he couldn't get up again."

"If I had been there," said the indignant Ingersoll, "that young ruffian would have had something to remember to his dying day."

"Well, Bob," said McLean, after a long pause, "you're that young ruffian, knocking away the crutch of faith from many a poor fellow that'll never be able to get up again." E. G. H.

REGENERATION

By MRS. M. BAXTER

EVEN from among the Pharisees, who, as a class, "trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others" (Luke 18:9), there were some who sought after a more real knowledge of God. Nicodemus had found in the teaching of the Lord Jesus, that which he had not found among the Pharisees and scribes; evidently a deep sense of something wanting in his soul, brought him to inquire of him whose presence in Jerusalem was causing wonder and inquiry amongst the people. Afraid of losing caste among his sect, Nicodemus came by night to Jesus. And he met with a welcome. No word of reproach for his cowardice, no hint that the time was inconvenient. Our beloved Lord was never known to consider himself when any needy soul drew near to him. The Pharisee introduced himself by saying, "Rabbi," or Teacher, "we know that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles which thou doest, except God be with him."

Our Lord showed him at once that which, of all else, he most needed to know, and of which as yet he knew nothing. "Except a man be born from above [margin], he cannot see the kingdom of God." Was this the clue to the deep sense of need in this inquirer's soul? Was it this lack which made his prayers powerless, and all his attempts to draw near to God unsatisfactory, leaving him with a doubt whether God took any notice of them? Was this the "new heart" and "new spirit" of which Ezekiel had prophesied (Ezek. 36:26)? How many such thoughts may have gone through the mind of this honest inquirer!

But he was eager to understand; and in his darkness to what was really spiritual, he asked, "How can a man be born when he is old?" All his conceptions were carnal, all his religion consisted in doing, not in being, in something which he would give to God, and not in something which God would make him to be. Jesus reiterated yet more strongly what he had already said, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit." It was all new to Nicodemus, entirely out of the range of his former conceptions; and so it is with every man by nature. "What man knoweth the things of a man save the spirit of a man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God" (I Cor. 2:11). How needful, then, for a man to be born of the Spirit, that he may be able to take in spiritual ideas!

Our Lord went on to say, "Marvel not that I said unto thee: Ye must be born again. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whitherest it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." It was all new to this "master of Israel." What could it mean? This new Teacher spoke of a power which was uncontrollable by man, a presence who breathed where he would, who was manifest: "Thou hearest the sound thereof;" and yet which could come and go without respect to any known law. "How can these things be?" was the answer of the astonished inquirer. "Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest not these things?"

The idea of religion in every man who has not been born of the Spirit is always in some way or other to develop the human. But this only comes to making offerings, of one kind or other, to an unknown God, without any real contact or communion with him. To be born from above brings into man a new life, a new being, which quickens the spirit into life, and opens a new horizon, in which God is the centre of all. Our Lord, still not revealing himself to Nicodemus as the Messiah, but speaking in the character of Teacher, which his inquirer had given him, goes on to say: "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen, and ye receive not our witness. If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?" and now the Lord speaks of that which is far above the theology of Nicodemus and his fellows: "No man hath ascended up to heaven but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven."

THE BIBLE SCHOOL

GATHERING AROUND THE BIG COFFEE BOILERS

A Bible School Coffee Brigade

HOW A UNIQUE EXPERIMENT IN HUMAN KINDNESS WAS UNDERTAKEN BY YOUNG BIBLE STUDENTS, AND HOW IT PROSPERED

ON the corner of Forty-ninth Street and Lexington Avenue, New York City, there stands a plain, substantial brick building, nine stories in height. Just opposite is a great hole in the ground, which hundreds of laborers are toiling day and night to make still bigger, in the interest of the New York Central Railroad. In the brick building there is a Bible Training School, and during the recent very cold weather, Dr. W. W. White, president of the school, and other members of the faculty, noticed that when the signal for the noon-hour sounded, that the laborers almost to a man started for the nearest saloon, where they drank beer or whiskey, many of them returning with pails or bottles, the contents of which were consumed with their lunch.

Dr. White and the others came to the conclusion that it would be a good idea to try the experiment of serving hot coffee free, and see if it would not be a substitute for beer and whiskey with which the men regaled themselves. Mrs. Martha E. Walker, House Superintendent of the school, with the assistance of Mr. O. C. Baker, undertook to serve the coffee, and found that there were many volunteers among the students who would help in the good work. So the next day, when the noon whistle blew, a company of men marched across the street with large steaming boilers of coffee, containing thirty-five gallons of the fragrant liquid. Two young ladies acted as waitresses, passing bright new brimming cups to the astonished men, who at first did not know what to make of the movement. They stared open-mouthed at the invaders, and some for a while appeared to think that this unprecedented performance boded no good—that it might even be a plot for wholesale poisoning. Being foreigners, and speaking and understanding but very little English, their suspicions may not have been unnatural. However, when some became sufficiently courageous to swallow a few mouthfuls, the rest watched them sharply, and finding that no untoward fate befel the venturesome ones, they were soon all reaching for the cups, which were filled again and yet again.

Next day was most unpleasant, and the workingmen built a great bonfire under the shelter of some rocks, where, partially protected from the cold wind and icy sleet, they were trying to eat their dinners as comfortably as such uncomfortable circumstances would admit. Again came the steaming boilers, and the bright-faced men and women from the Bible School, and as they made their appearance, they received a voluble and enthusiastic greeting from the laborers, who called down upon the heads of these newly-found friends the blessings of all the saints in the Roman calendar.

Meantime the corner saloons were beginning to suffer a falling off in their noon trade, and it was not exactly a blessing which they invoked for the instigators of the hot coffee movement. The yard superintendents of the laborers all agree that anything that will keep the men out of the saloons is a good thing, for they say that the carefulness with which the men handle dynamite is not enhanced by visits to the saloon. Some of the laborers, of course, will not give up their drink just because someone gives them a cup of coffee. They want both whiskey and coffee; but the good people who are doing this practical work are not discouraged, especially as the construction company propose building a shed or shelter where the workmen can eat in bad weather. There is no song service, no attempt at propaganda attached to the hot coffee campaign, but a kindly word goes with each offered cup. One man said as he took his coffee: "Me know-a God"—putting his hand on his heart, and lifting his eyes upward—"me know-a God, He give."

THE BIBLE SCHOOL COFFEE BRIGADE AT WORK

A few of the laborers grumbled at what they seemed to think was an intrusion; they were the kind who are leaders when any disturbance is on foot—the sort who are natural fault-finders, and who seem happiest when a strike is on, and everyone is out of work. These men did not relish any movement which indicated the least interference with the established saloon habit. One man, whose face was scarred, as if he might have been in a dynamite explosion, returned from the saloon with his beer-can in hand, and whiskey-flask under his blouse. He demanded that his more happy-tempered fellow workmen move, and give him a seat near the fire. This they refused to do, until one of the young ladies asked them to give the disgruntled one a place, at the same time offering him a steaming cup of coffee, which he gulped down, saying: "Good-a lady, bad-a coffee;" but his face took on a pleasanter expression, and he ceased his railing, and no doubt another day will win him over, and he will be willing to acknowledge that the coffee, as well as the young lady who served it, is "good-a."

The Bible School people hope not only to reach the men, but their families also, who will have a good many more comforts in their homes, when the husbands and fathers no longer spend their noon hour in the corner saloon. This is a very small beginning to what may prove an important movement along Christian and temperance lines. Mr. Baker is sanguine that the work can be extended, with the co-operation of the construction and railway companies, who can readily see what an improvement will come, if this effort, which the Bible School has begun, can be followed up and developed.

The management at the school feel sure of ultimate success in reaching the hearts and homes of many of these workingmen, and say that they will continue the hot coffee at noon as long as the cold weather lasts. They will also endeavor to start a similar movement, whenever there is a big public work in progress, in other parts of the city.

ALL THINGS NEW

A Sermon by Rev. Joseph Hamilton, Author of "Our Own and Other Worlds"*

THIS world we live in is a very old world. Even according to unscientific reckoning it must be nearly six thousand years old. Some think it is very much older than that. You know it is generally believed that this earth was once a puff of hot vapor thrown off by the sun, and later a glowing ball of fire. In that case, it would need a long time to cool down to be fit for men to live on. And Lord Kelvin, who is a very learned man, makes a curious calculation as to the time the earth had to cool down to be a fit home for the human race. He thinks it took the earth at least a hundred millions of years to get cool enough for us to come upon the scene. A hundred millions of years! Well, no doubt it would take a long time; but just how many thousands or millions of years seems rather too large a problem for us to solve. However, we see this is a very old world.

REV. JOSEPH HAMILTON

And then, the ways of the world are very old too. Men are much the same now that they always were; and they do much the same things. Men have the same hopes and fears, the same joys and sorrows they always had. People are born into the world, and pass out of the world, just the same now as in the olden time. We toil and play, we fret and worry, we make love or make war, we sleep and rise, we sicken and die, just as our fathers did. There is nothing very new in the world after all.

New Uses for Old Forces

So much did Solomon, the wise man of old, feel this, that he said there was "no new thing under the sun." In a very large sense that is true. It is true in this sense, that there is no new material in the world, and there are no new forces in the world. We certainly do some new things in our time; but the materials we use, and the forces we use are not new; they are as old as creation. For instance, we make steam engines now which the old world would be surprised to see; but the power of steam is not new, it was always here, only men did not know how to use it in the way we do now. Or again, we make photographs now; we actually make the sun paint our pictures. Of course our fathers could not do that. But you see the sun's light was always here, waiting and ready to do this, only our fathers did not know just how to use the sun's light as we do. And the cataract of Niagara was here ages and ages ago, but men did not know how to transmit its mighty forces into light and heat and power. But it is only force transmitted, not created. So in this sense there is nothing really new; there is no new material, and there is no new force in the world that was not here always. And man can make no new material or new force. He must just do the best he can with the things he finds in the world; he may put these things in new shapes, and he may put them to new uses; that is all he can do; man can really make nothing new.

The Voice from the Throne

Now I want to tell you, my friends, that what man cannot do, God can. Man can make nothing new, God can make all things new. Saint John had a vision of heaven. Among many wonderful things he saw there, he saw a throne, and One that sat on the throne. Then he heard a voice. He that sat on the throne said: "Behold, I make all things new." God can, and does, and will make all things new. He sits on the throne, you see. He has all power. He makes all things new. I am going to mention some things that God does really make new, and they are things that concern ourselves very directly.

1. Let me say first that God makes this new year. How do we come to have a new year? We measure off 365 days for the old year, and then we commence a new one. Yes; but that calculation of ours is founded on a great law in nature. The law is that the earth makes one complete revolution round the sun in 365 days, and that revolution is one year. Now, it is God who sits on the throne, the God who made the worlds, that projected this earth in her orbit, and fixed her speed, that thus gives us our new year. And here we may notice one thing about this movement of the earth that is perfectly astounding: She performs this revolution, not in 365 days exactly, but in 365 days, and some hours, and some minutes, and some seconds, and some fractions of a second. So amazingly exact is she to time, that astronomers have to express it in decimals. And the exact time they have found to be 365.2564 days, and the earth has kept to this time through ages and ages past! Do you know of anything more astounding than that? And it is by this marvellous arrangement that God gives us the new year. When we get such a glimpse of his stupendous way of working, do we not feel the thrill of his eternal power and Godhead?

New Life

2. God makes new the face of nature. Just now it is winter, but by and by it will be spring. What new life and beauty we shall then see on every hand? What a change will pass on the grass, the trees, the shrubs, the flowers. What power is it that makes this new life every spring? It is the power of God. Man can do many things, but this one thing he knows he cannot do. Man cannot put life into anything. He cannot make a leaf or a blade of grass. He can make imitations of flowers, but they are only imitations. The wonderful thing we call life is not there. God only can make life. In the spring of the year, you have only to look abroad and see what a change has been wrought. The winter has changed to spring; death has changed to life; God has made all things new.

3. Now notice another thing: God makes new the hearts of men. God, who makes all things new without, can make all things new within. The God who changes the face of nature, also changes the heart of man. And, my friends, I really think this work that God does within, is a greater work than what he does without. For, in this inner world, God has to operate on hard, obstinate human hearts; whereas, in the outer world, all matter is plastic in his hands. These hearts of ours, are hard, wild, wicked hearts, till God changes them. We have all sinned; our nature has all gone wrong. Do you not believe that? Well, look through the world. Read the daily papers. What suffering and sorrow you see on every hand; what poverty, and toil, and distress; what grinding, worrying care; what envy, and hatred, and strife, and crime. What is the cause of all this? There is only one cause; and that is sin. It is sin that brings all this evil. Men's hearts are wicked; there can be no happiness till these hearts are changed. But who can change the heart? You cannot do it; I cannot do it; no one can do it. As easy could you change the winter into spring, as change this wicked human heart.

New Hearts

But what we cannot do, God can. He has in himself just the things we need to change us. He has in himself, all love, and grace, and pity, and tenderness, and wisdom, and truth. These are just the things we need to change us, and make us new. You know we cannot give what we have not got. That is why we cannot make the new heart. But God has all we want, and, in giving us that, he makes us new. It is the warmth of the sun that makes all things new without; so it is the warmth of God's love that makes all new within. Mark you. It is he that sitteth on the throne that says: "Behold, I make all things new."

And I would ask you to notice especially that God really wants to make our hearts new. In the book of the prophet Ezekiel, we have this glorious promise: "A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh." Is not that a glorious promise? It may be fulfilled for every one of us. God can make new hearts here to-day. He is willing to make yours new. Believe that he can, and that he will. Only you must ask him to do it. You must be willing to be changed, else God cannot change you. But he can change you now, if you will. So I would ask you to put up that prayer of David, which was just his prayer for a new heart. "Create in me," said David, "a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me." If we truly come to God with that prayer and that desire, we shall know that he does make all things new within.

Just think, my friends, what a change would come over society if everybody's heart were made new! Why then there would be love instead of hate. Then there would be good-will instead of ill-will. Then we should try to help each other instead of hindering each other. Then there would be trust, and no room for suspicion. Then there would be no more lies or roguery in trade, no more falsehood of any kind, or over-reaching, or envy, or treachery. And what new homes there would be, if we had all this new heart! New hearts would make new homes. Love would be enthroned then at every fireside. Oh, the horror, and shame, and agony, and despair, that blight and wither the happiness of home—all that would be changed if hearts were changed. And we look for the day when this change will be wrought, and when God, looking down on this human race, can say: "Behold, I make all things new."

4. Now, further, will you please notice this, that God makes new these mortal bodies. We are charmed with beauty. Whether it be a beautiful landscape, or a beautiful sky, or a beautiful picture, or a beautiful human face, we are all charmed by beauty. What is there so beautiful as the sweet, innocent face of a child? The hearts of the hardest men are sometimes softened by the sight of an innocent child asleep. Such a sight makes us think of the beauty of God's creatures before sin came in and spoiled it. It makes us think, too, of that happy world on high, where all is beauty, and joy, and peace.

Restored Youth

We would like to keep this beauty of childhood if we could. But we cannot. How often in later years do toil, and dirt, and care, and sin, and sorrow mar the beauty of the human face divine. Look at the face of a hard, brutal, vicious man. And then to think that that is the face of the innocent child that the mother dandled on her knee and rocked softly to sleep, only a few years ago! Ah, so it is! What a terrible change! And then, under the happiest conditions, age comes creeping on. It cannot be kept back. To be sure, there are wonderful remedies advertised in the papers, telling us how we may be beautiful for ever. And many are the tricks of adornment that some people use to stave off decay. But age still comes creeping on. No patent drug or dye that I know of will keep it off. We do not keep beautiful for ever. To be sure, we may get our photographs taken, and if we choose, the photographer can make us look very much younger than we really are. By a few simple touches, he can wipe out the lines that time and trouble have made in our faces. A very clever fellow is the photographer! By a few slight touches, he can make us ten or twenty years younger. That is very pleasant. So we look at the picture and we are flattered. Really, we did not think we were so young! Ah! but we chance to look in the glass, and we are not so flattered. The picture may tell lies, but the glass tells no lies, so when we look in the glass we find we are not so very young or beautiful as we thought. Ah, we cannot stave off decay: "we all do fade as a leaf."

But, my friends, if we are God's redeemed children we are to be made beautiful again, a thousand times more fair than we were before. From the dust of death we are to rise again. The grave will but refine this flesh. We are to be young again, with a youth that will never grow old; we are to be beautiful again, with a beauty that will never grow dim with years. This mortal is to be cast off that the immortal may be put on. The new body will know no decay, but will forever thrill with the ecstacy of immortal youth and glow with the beauty of unfading bloom.

Eternal Life

It is a striking thing, is it not, that when angels appeared in this world they so often appeared as young men? And why? Just because they are young. They have been in being for thousands and thousands of years, yet they are not old, they never can grow old, nobody can grow old in heaven. And so, when God makes new these bodies of ours, there will be no more decay; we shall be young for evermore.

It may be that you had a child who died many years ago. You felt sure at the time that your child went to heaven, and you feel sure now that your child has been in heaven all these years. And yet, don't you still think of that child as being a child still? According to years, that child would be a man or a woman now, yet you feel as if the child were a child still; you cannot think of the child ever growing old. Now in that I think our feeling in the main is right. There may be growing maturity, but never old age, in heaven. Eternity writes no wrinkle on the radiant brow of the orified. Moses and Elijah on the Mount of Transfiguration seem not a day older than when they left this orld. We age here, but we age no more when we get ere. When God makes us new by giving us new imortal bodies, then we are to be young, and vigorous d beautiful forever.

5. Now this leads me to say further, that God is aking for us now a new home. He that sits on the rone says, "Behold, I make all things new;" and if e does, he will make for us a new home. When we et the new body we shall need a new home. This orld would not suit us then. No, but—

A house eternal, built by God,
Shall lodge the holy mind,
When once these prison walls have fallen,
By which 'tis now confined.

Just before Jesus went away from this world, he told is disciples that he was going away in order to prepare r them a new home in heaven. "I go," he said, "to repare a place for you, and if I go and prepare a place r you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, at where I am ye may be also." And I think, my riends, it adds greatly to the charm of that new home, at Jesus, our Lord, is himself making it ready, as it ere, with his own hands. You know how a newly arried bride looks forward to her new home. Though be a very humble home, if it has been made eady for her by the man she loves, that gives it a new harm, and it becomes to her the dearest place in all he world. And so if we love Jesus, we shall look forard with the more joy to our home in heaven, because he Lord whom we love is making that home ready for s, and will soon take us there. What a beautiful ome that will be no words can tell.

We speak of the realm of the blest,
That country so bright and so fair
And oft are its glories confessed,
But what must it be to be there?

This world is beautiful indeed, but the most beautiful things here, we may well believe, are but dim hints f the glory of the better land. Yet we have some ints here that help us to think of the beauty of that etter world. I believe God has flung down here on arth a little of the beauty of the world unseen, and he as done this, I believe, to lift our hearts to think of he glory that is beyond mortal sight. There, for instance, is a golden sunset. The sun is sinking in the West. The clouds of crimson and amber and gold are piled up like mountains of glory; or they sketch themselves out in feathery, fantastic forms, like angels' wings; or they range themselves into golden bars like heaven's golden gates. Through the breaks in those golden clouds you look away into the infinite blue beyond, and you feel sure that infinite, untrodden blue, too pure for mortal feet to travel, is the way to the better land. I say, have there not been times when on gazing on a sunset like that, you have felt softened and refined, and your thoughts soared away to scenes of bliss where suns rise and set no more?

Or, we might take another hint of heaven on a smaller scale. There, for instance, is a drop of dew. It is suspended from a leaf. All the changing colors of the rainbow blend and quiver in that drop of crystal beauty. As you look into it steadily, if you are in a contemplative mood, the drop of dew in your imagination expands into a world. It is no longer a drop of dew, it is a world; and what a world of beauty! Surely God has flung such beauty down here below to make us think of and long for the unimagined glory of the skies!

A New Home

Or, we might take one other picture. There are some woodland scenes, which, especially in the fading glory of autumn, have a kind of sad, yet sweet and softening influence on the heart. In such a scene as I think of, and when the feelings are tender and pure, you might almost fancy yourself transported beyond this vale of tears. Those sylvan dales, and arches, and dells, that stretch away in the distance seem like the very bowers of paradise where the redeemed of the Lord might walk; and those banks of foliage, with their changing, glowing colors, rise up before us, and stretch away beyond, like very hills of glory. If this lower world has such scenes of beauty, what will heaven be when He who sits on the throne makes all things new?

And then this new home will be not only beautiful, but it will be happy. That is the best of it. For beauty of itself does not bring happiness. How many homes there are that are very beautiful, wanting in nothing that can gratify taste or luxury, yet happiness is not known there. There is something better than beauty, and that is love. Where love reigns, a cottage is better than a palace. And the new home in heaven will be a home of love. No jars or discords there; no ill-will or envy or strife; no sullen, scowling looks; no prodigal breaking away from home; no sin; no sorrow; no shame; no tears. "I saw," says John, "a new heaven and a new earth." There is to be a "new Jerusalem," the holy city of God. That will be the new home of God's redeemed. Then, "Home, sweet Home! There is no place like home." And there is no home like heaven!

A New Song

6. And this leads us to one last thought here: God will give us a new song. What is there that thrills us like the power of music? What power have we that is really so divine as the power to sing? And there will be music in heaven. John says, "They sung as it were a new song." Who can imagine the rapture of that new song? And to think that you and I may yet join in that new song! To think that we may be of those who praise God day and night in this temple! Yea, and we may get the first notes of that song now. The Psalmist says, "He brought me up also out of a horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God." So, if we are taken out of the pit of sin, and if we are placed on the rock,—which is Christ,—then God will give us a new song of joy; and this new song will be the beginning of the new song we shall sing in heaven. And you notice that John gives us some of the words of the heavenly song. Of course, he did not hear it all, but he heard a little of it, and these are some of the words that were sung: "Blessing, and glory, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever." "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever."

Let me say, dear friends, that all these new things may be ours. Only we must be saved from sin. We cannot save ourselves, but Christ can save us, every one. He died that we may live. He asks us to come to him for pardon, and peace, and happiness. He alone can give us the new heart, and the new home, and the new song.

Though we are sinners every one,
Jesus died;
And though our crown of peace is gone,
Jesus died.
We may be cleansed from every stain,
We may be crowned with bliss again,
And in that land of pleasure reign,
Jesus died.

HAPPY IN THEIR "LOG COLLEGE"

EARLY in the efforts of the Society of Soul-Winners among the mountaineers of the Cumberlands, in Kentucky and East Tennessee, the need of widespread Gospel instruction became apparent, and it was determined to establish catechetical schools, to be accompanied by simple, earnest Gospel preaching. The plan is, for one preacher and two thoroughly trained women teachers (at least one of them a good singer), to go into a community and settle down for a season's campaign. They hold at least one session a day, except Mondays, either in a Gospel tent or a schoolhouse, and gather in the children and young people, and teach them hymns, Scripture verses, catechism and the Apostles' Creed, all answers to questions being made in concert by the whole class. These teachers were delighted with the progress of their classes. After a few months of such teaching, the claims of the Gospel to individual acceptance were presented, and large numbers of the people were baptized on confession of faith. Thus a basis was formed for future churches.

FACULTY AND STUDENTS OF WITHERSPOON LOG COLLEGE

This teaching was interspersed with drills, intended to secure prompt and concerted motion and vocal responses. Schools were uniformed, the girls in bright plaid gingham dresses and red calico hats, the boys with Turkish caps and red sashes. All these were made by the girls, thus teaching them to sew. Saturday afternoons were given up to an outdoor parade, which brought out most of the folks for miles around as spectators. Breathing spells of from three to five minutes were filled up with recitals of such truths and facts as the teacher thought would be profitable to all assembled.

One of these schools was established by Dr. Miles Saunders, assisted by his daughter, Miss Louise Saunders, and Miss Erastes Balee, under his Gospel tent, near John Gross', on the banks of Middle Fork of the Kentucky River, at the mouth of Squabble Creek, in Perry County, Kentucky, in May, 1900. During the summer, seventy-five converts were gathered in. A site was donated, and preparations were begun for building Laurel Point Presbyterian Church. In April of the following year, the school moved from the Gospel tent into a beautiful frame church, 44 x 24 feet. Next spring, Rev. Harvey S. Murdoch, a Mississippian, then in charge of a church in Brooklyn, N. Y., joined in the Soul-Winners' work. Dr. Saunders and his daughter, Miss Louise, had planned the erection of a schoolhouse near the church; but Mr. Murdoch had broader views, and it was planned to build where ample playgrounds could be had. Mr. John Gross donated six acres of land in the bottom across Squabble Creek sloping off up the mountain, and Mr. James Sandlin donated three acres of forest land still higher up. The congregation itself donated the timber to make the logs and lumber, and the corner-stone for Witherspoon College was laid, and the work went prosperously on. The college building of logs, stands on the side of a mountain facing southward, commanding a fine view of the cliff-bound channel of the Middle Fork of the Kentucky River, and also a view of the narrow valley away to the Whoop-for-Larrie range. Immediately in front of the college, four hundred yards away, looms up a great mountainous promontory between the two streams. A foot-bridge of one hundred-foot span is swung from the cliffs of the church promontory across the creek, forming the connection between the college campus and the church grounds.

The college building is 40 x 52 feet, and two stories high. It is of logs, sawed to the form of 4x10 inches. A dormitory of sixteen rooms, just finished, is of spruce pine logs. On another part of the campus there is now in process of erection a two-story refectory, also of sawed logs.

In this pioneer mountain Log College, there are now enrolled 125 pupils, taught by a faculty of five competent teachers, able to impart instruction in common school, high school and collegiate courses, and a special normal course. The college has great prospects, especially in training common school-teachers for the whole mountain region. This month, there will be present from twenty-five to forty of these teachers. It is a Christian school; every class, from the infant class on up, has one recitation a day in Bible study.

A village is already gathering about the college. College and church together have already planted several important missions, some of them developing into churches, and the social, educational, religious and moral uplift of the whole population round about, is very manifest.

The Old Peace Palace and the New

Toward which the Eyes of the World are Turning in Hope and Expectation

BY LOUISE D. MITCHELL

THE recent generous gift to the Dutch Government by Mr. Andrew Carnegie, of $1,500,000, for the express purpose of erecting a Peaee Palace in the Hague, has evoked much interest throughout the world, and concentrated attention upon this one place in the universe where all nations are to feel themselves akin in the promotion of an international peace that shall eliminate warfare, and lift upon a higher plane of development this one phase of civilized times. Therefore it is that the nations await with interest the building of this palace.

After receiving the money for this purpose, the Dutch Government began its search for a proper building site in the Hague, and this it found a most difficult matter, for one of the express wishes of Mr. Carnegie was that the palace should be erected where the library, which was to be part of the general scheme, could be easily accessible to all caring to make use of it. Besides this, property in the Hague has enormous value, and land-holders will not sell excepting at fabulous prices, which far exceed the sum apportioned to the purchase of the land for the building.

THE PRESENT PEACE PALACE, AMID ITS NOBLE SURROUNDINGS

Deer Park, a beautiful forest on the outskirts of the city, was finally brought under consideration, but when negotiations were opened, and old documents were consulted, it was discovered that Prince William I., who had given the park to the town, had stipulated that it always be retained intact as part of the Woods, so that all idea of securing it was finally abandoned by the government. After many discouraging failures of this kind, a beautiful site on the "Benoordenhoutschen Weg" has been selected, and the palace will eventually be erected there. The Dutch Government has purchased this site, which covers some sixteen acres of land, from the city, for 440,000 florins, or $176,000, and has presented it to what is now definitely known as "The Carnegie Fund," intending by this gift to show its appreciation of Mr. Carnegie.

As yet, however, the plans for the building itself are unknown. A prize for the most practical and artistic design has been offered, and many eminent architects are competing for it. "The Carnegie Fund" was duly acknowledged as a body by the Queen, on May 30, 1904, and upon June 6, of the same year, was inaugurated with all necessary legal formalities. The "Fund" has fifteen regulations which deal with the site, the style, and the purpose of the palace. Its Executive Committee consists of five men, who are to hold their first formal meeting on April 1, 1905, and present to the government a report of all work that has been done by them during the preceding year.

A requirement of this Committee is that its members shall all be Hollanders, and of reputable character, four of whom are selected by the Queen to serve for a term of two years, and the fifth by the permanent council of the Court of Arbitration, and for the same term of years. The Queen selects from these five men, a president, a secretary, and a treasurer. The council consists of nine members, who are as follows: The Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Commerce and Industry, the President of the House of Lords, the President of the House of Commons, the Vice-President of the Council of State, the President of the Supreme Court of Justice, and the Procureur-General of the Supreme Court of Justice. This august body is supposed to supervise the work of the Committee.

Pending the erection of the Peace Palace, the $1,500,000 of "The Carnegie Fund" is invested by the Dutch Government at a three per cent. interest per annum. The significance of this prospective palace cannot be lightly estimated by even the most superficial thinker, for history of vital import will be woven about its stately magnificence, where all future questions of international disturbance are to be discussed and, it is to be hoped settled, by this high Court of Arbitration. That the establishing of this palace and this Peace Conference will mark a tremendous step in the progress of the civilized world is unquestioned, for in the settlement of all matters of conflict between nations civilization has been curiously and startlingly retarded by adherence to barbaric methods of adjustment, preferring the blow of primitive man to the stroke of his intellectual development.

For all those watching the growth of nations with keen interest, it was gratifying to note the widespread influence of the first Peace Conference of five years ago and the intelligent appreciation of its purpose. We have Secretary Hay's assertion, as we have our own conviction, that "it marked an epoch in the history of nations," and that "it resulted in the acceptance by the signatory Powers of conventions for the peaceful adjustment of international difficulties by arbitration, and for certain humane amendments to the laws and customs of war by land and sea." This latter clause being peculiarly significant during these times of atrocities perpetrated upon the sea by a nation immersed in the barbaric method of settling "international difficulties."

We have, also, the further satisfaction of having read the announcement of Secretary Hay's official request to the representatives of the United States abroad, to call the attention of the different governments to which they are attached, to the proposal of President Roosevelt for a Second Peace Conference, to be held at the Hague in the little "House in the Woods." At this Conference, it is hoped that certain questions left open at the first, may finally attain to a satisfactory settlement. Among these questions were those affecting the rights and duties of neutrals; the inviolability of private property in warfare, and the bombardment of ports, towns and villages by naval forces.

There is nothing, perhaps, that will do more to promote the cause of peace than the horrible butchery now going on in the Far East, where human life is being swept on into Eternity in a stream of wanton murder. If the enforced adjustment of the subject which is bringing these two nations into conflict does no other good, it will at least show to the world the details of war in a brutal and convincing light as only the "onlooker" could see it. The pity of it is that the nation—as the individual—must see its way to "higher things" only on the "stepping-stones" of the bodies of its dead brothers.

In the beautiful Haagsche Bosch, a parklike forest intersected by avenues of stately trees and about a mile and a-half from The Hague, stands a royal villa known throughout Holland—and now the world—as the "Huis ten Bosch," or "The House in the Woods," and it was here in this villa, in the year 1899, that the First International Peace Conference was held, at which twenty-six Powers were represented, and which marked an epoch in the history of the nations. This impressive gathering met in what is known as the Orange Room, an octagonal hall adorned with scenes from the life of Prince Frederick Henry of Orange, in memoriam of whom the Palace was erected in 1645 by his widow, the Princess Amalia of Solms.

The paintings which cover the walls from floor to ceiling, are remarkable for their historical and fantastic portrayal of the life of Prince Frederick Henry from the cradle to the grave, and from the activity of the scenes which they depict, impress the observer with a sense of an utter lack of repose. The room is lighted partly from the cupola, and partly from the windows at the right of the room, and the floor is so highly polished as to reflect the paintings from above. The walls are about fifty feet in height, the upper part made of wood, and the lower covered with canvas. In the dome of the room is a portrait of Princess Amalia of Solms. The room itself is not large, neither is it in the least impressive, save for its works of art, and the fact of the notable event which took place there on May 5th, in 1899. A few chairs and sofas ranged around the room, close to the walls, are all the furniture that it contains. A yellow light, drifting in through the windows before the curtains are drawn, lends a touch of mellowness to the atmosphere of the place which is in itself impressive, as being suggestive of antiquity and, perhaps, of the tremendous importance of the questions discussed, and the great issues of the decisions rendered during the first Peace Conference held within its walls.

The dining-room of the villa is remarkable for the curious decorations of its walls. They are painted in imitation of bas-relief and produce a perfect illusion, and it is not until a close inspection brings to light the fact that they are an imitation only, that one realizes how complete is the deception. The subjects of these decorations are, Atalanta, Venus, Adonis and Genii. Chinese, Saxon and Delft porcelain of 1748 are also an interesting feature of this room. The walls of the Japanese room are covered with wonderful tapestry representing scenes of Japanese life, and the upholstery is an exquisite design of birds and plants and vines. Curious cabinets and screens are also a part of the attraction, the entire furnishings of the apartment having been presented to William V., of Orange, in 1795.

THE FINEST PAINTING IN THE ORANGE ROOM

In one of the rooms is a fine portrait of John Lothrop Motley—1814-77—who wrote part of his "History of the Dutch Republic" in this palace. The palace itself is not large, neither is it in the least imposing. It was originally intended merely for a royal hunting-lodge and contains but two bedrooms, so that royalty, to remain there at all, would be obliged to dispense with its retinue. It is seldom used by the present Queen of Holland or her consort, and since the Peace Conference has elected to use it as its place of meeting for the time being, it has become more a museum than anything else, and has many visitors during the year.

[Cable dispatches within a recent date, contain a rumor that it is the purpose of King Christian, of Denmark, to hold a World's Peace Conference in Copenhagen, in May or June. It was stated in the dispatches that the aged monarch—who had on many occasions employed his influence in European affairs on the side of peace—had already received favorable responses from a large number of rulers. King Christian's hope is that an arrangement may be concluded at the approaching meeting, which will assure the peace of Europe, if not of the world, for many years to come. Nothing is known of the proposed conference, however, beyond the mere rumor given above.]

SWITZERLAND'S NEW PRESIDENT

IN the Swiss Congress, the term of the President is fixed at one short year, and the possessor of the office is not eligible for the next year. This involves a frequent change of administrative personnel, even though in the course of years some of the incumbents may occupy the office two or three times. Since the beginning of the new century, five different men have been placed at the head of the Republic's affairs.

In the election of a President of the Swiss Congress, political motives are not determinative. It is customary to entrust each of the seven members of the Upper Chamber of Congress with the presidency in turn. Should one be repeatedly chosen as a member of this highest Congress for a number of years, he might, in his turn, become President more than once. Dr. A. Deucher, who for more than twenty years has been a member of this Congress, has been elected President three times, and Dr. J. Zemp, who has belonged to the Congress for more than fifteen years, has held the executive office twice.

The President of this Congress, elected for the year 1905, Marc Ruchet, has been a member of the Congress since 1899. He was born at Morges, on Lake Geneva, Sept. 14, 1853, and is the son of a teacher. After he had studied law at Lausanne and Heidelberg, he went as a law practitioner with the celebrated law firm of Ruchonet at Lausanne — a firm which for over twenty years has had a national reputation, M. Ruchonet having been one of the most esteemed members of the Congress. Young Ruchet was drawn early into politics, and at the age of twenty-nine was elected a member of the Upper Chamber. In 1877 he became a member of the Confederated Parliament, and thereafter he was still further promoted to various high offices. He is a sound jurist, a legislator of great experience, and extremely popular on account of his ability, and his energy in working for the best interests of the nation.

Bulgaria Grateful

MR. RADOSLAV J. SETCHANOFF, a young Bulgarian student, now at Alfred, N. Y., sends to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an extract from a Bulgarian journal—The Evening Post of Philippopolis—which contains a very pleasing recognition of the aid rendered by Americans to the suffering Macedonians. The extract, translated, is as follows:

When, last year, the population of that ruined country (Macedonia), left without shelter and food, was in danger of starvation, the Austrian Civil Agent did not find it necessary to open a credit for the most urgent needs of that country, while the Russian Agent did not give out even five kopecks for relieving and supplying the suffering people in his district. Only England, the faithful defender of the weak, in alliance with the United States of America, went there; their agents, like the good Samaritan, came and bought bread for the hungry, built houses for those without a shelter, bought 100 pairs of oxen for the farmers. They did not ask the population for its name, for its blood and its sympathies. They did not demand that it should deny its Bulgarian name, in order to get their help; they did not distribute their money and help among the Albanian Beys and brigands, as Austria has been doing for several years. Thanks to the English and Americans, solely to them the slaughter was partially stopped, a check was put to violation, and the population breathed more freely.

The Civil Agents of the Austrian and Russian Empires felt isolated. They felt uneasy before this most brilliant example of the generosity and humanity of England and America!

Social Contrasts

ONE of the saddest sights in New York is the line of hungry men who wait outside the Bowery Mission for the supper that is given an hour after midnight to all who come for it. There are other "Bread Lines" in other parts of the city, in which men, haggard and hungry, stand patiently waiting their turn to receive a loaf of bread. Sorrowful beyond expression is the spectacle of these men, whose misery and want are so plainly marked on their wan faces. How gladly would they work if work could be obtained! To them a quarter to secure a bed would be a boon, and even the pitiful gift of food is gratefully received.

In striking contrast to this spectacle are two reports in the daily journals of the past week. One of these is a description of a supper given by a wealthy bachelor in his own home, to four hundred guests, which cost $26,500. The other is of a meal spread in a well-known hotel, at the expense of a millionaire, who entertained sixty guests at a cost of $10,000. The latter is called a "gold dinner," from the fact that the service was entirely of gold, and is said to be the finest in the country. The viands were of the most costly description, unsurpassed, it is believed, since that famous banquet given by the Duke of Alva, in Paris, in the seventeenth century. Delicate exotics in rich profusion ornamented the tables, and costly wines of rare vintages were served to the guests. While these gentlemen and ladies were feasting at a cost to their entertainer of over $166 a head, within a few blocks the long bread-lines were waiting, anxiously and wearily, for their loaves of bread.

Doubtless these hospitable entertainers would tell us that they have the right to do what they choose with their own. Men have talked in that way in all ages of the world, and have feasted while human beings at their doors were perishing with hunger. Their retort, like that of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" argues an indifference to suffering worthy only of an animal. One would have hoped that nineteen centuries of Christianity would have induced a better spirit, even if ordinary civilization had failed. In New York there are a hundred thousand persons unemployed, whose need is of the hardest, yet these wealthy people spent in senseless extravagance, money that would have kept them for a week. It is not socialism that protests against these things, but common humanity. On the higher plane of Christianity the duty is still more obligatory. Whatever such people may think, the test will one day be applied: "Whosoever hath this world's goods and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"

Woman and the Club

IT was stated not long ago, at a gathering of club-women in New York City, that "the salvation of the sex was to be reached through the woman's club." This is a rather sweeping assertion, ignoring many other influences which we have been taught to consider as having a bearing upon the well-being of women. Of course, the speaker had reference to the emancipation of women from what used to be styled the "trammels of sex," and inequality of opportunity.

Women have certainly gained much in the past half-century; but they were far on the road before women's clubs had gained a foothold. Many a woman had worked out her own problem before she ever thought of joining any organization, and many such are still "unattached."

Granting the fact that, in many cases, women's clubs have been a material help to women, those who go to swell the thousands making up the membership of such organizations, are by no means the only ones among the "gentler sex" who have made a success in different walks of life. "Success" would seem to be a word better calculated to express this particular club-woman's meaning than the term she chose. In union there is strength; and all honor to the women who have banded themselves together to right the wrong and establish the right; but let no woman imagine that merely by joining a club she can evade individual responsibility. The woman who, by precept and example, quietly works in her own home, and in her own particular environment, can accomplish as much, and oftentimes does accomplish more, than by belonging to a club, where the strife for precedence, and the scramble for office, often offset any appreciable good which comes through membership. Club-women are quite as apt to lose their sense of proportion as others of their sex, and often the grand object for which the organization stands is buried under a mass of petty personal jealousies and ambitions, which crowd the "salvation" idea close to the wall. There are organizations standing for the noblest of principles, and others that are little more than a succession of "pink teas." Between these two extremes there are many organizations for the would-be club-woman to choose from.

Education is not entirely a matter of the study of books, neither is advancement in all that is desirable in woman a matter of clubs. They are both means to the same end, and therefore valuable to the woman who realizes that it is through education that she has been enabled to advance along the lines which, to-day, place her in competition with man, who has had so many centuries the start of her in the race of life. Real "salvation," in the club-woman's acceptation of the term, will come when men's organizations and women's clubs join hands and pull with, not against, each other "for the cause that needs assistance, for the wrongs that need resistance, and the good that they can do."

King Christian's Peace Council

THERE is a singular appropriateness in the intelligence conveyed by the cable that "the good King Christian" of Denmark — known throughout the length and breadth of Europe as one of the most amiable and democratic of monarchs—should have decided to call a conference of the crowned heads, to discuss in Copenhagen next spring, ways and means for securing international peace. In the comparative quiet of his little northern realm, unvexed by home discords and on good terms with all of his neighbors, the aged ruler has seen the nations putting on the panoply of war, and sending forth their powerful fleets and their armies to battle. He has seen the Baltic alive with formidable battleships. He has observed the turmoil in four great neighboring nations, all armed for conflict. He has heard the ominous mutterings in France, England, Germany, and Russia, and he has noted also, no doubt with due appreciation, the heavy burdens that are laid upon the people of those countries by those unprecedented military and naval preparations. Knowing as he does the principal actors in this great drama of strife, he is in a better position than most men to employ his influence for European pacification.

But though the aged king is revered by all his royal compeers, it is not easy to understand how he can accomplish much by his proposed conference. Denmark is a little realm, insignificant when contrasted with its neighbors. King Christian's persuasive powers, however great they may prove to be, can hardly be expected to accomplish such results as might follow the work of the Hague Tribunal, which is the constituted body before which some thirty nations have solemnly agreed to bring their troubles for adjustment. It is true, the Hague Court has been overridden, and even shamefully ignored; but it is an existent fact, nevertheless, and lovers of peace in every land hope and expect to see it restored to its position as the world's arbiter.

King Christian's peace assemblage, however, may not be unproductive of beneficent results. With broader views than many of his contemporaries, he may see the wisdom of urging upon his royal guests, when they meet at his capital, the advisability of rehabilitating the Hague Court, and of firmly establishing its authority. If this be his purpose—and if his conference be not called merely as a substitute for the Hague and to undermine the authority of that august tribunal—then his course deserves unstinted approval. Any movement, whether from king or commoner, that makes for the peace of the world, is to be welcomed. The old king may justify his name and do honor to his throne and his race if he shall succeed in persuading the leading European powers to forego, even for a limited time, the costly ar ruinous game of modern war. Let us hope he may b able to induce them to try the experiment.

Opportunities at Panama

NOW that work on the great Canal may be said t have fairly begun, it is opportune to consider ou responsibilities as a nation toward the large army o laborers engaged on that gigantic undertaking. I Cuba and Porto Rico, the stringent hygienic measure adopted under American administration produced very marked improvement in sanitary conditions, and were unquestionably the means of saving many lives Fever and kindred diseases disappeared as if by magic, and the safety and salubrity of the islands attracted many Americans, who otherwise would have hesitated to visit them. At Panama, similar results will probably follow the introduction of sanitary measures, and the Isthmus, in course of time, will be rendered comparatively safe. This cleansing process, however, is a herculean task, and may occupy more than a single season.

Meanwhile there is another opportunity there which our government should not overlook. The spiritual wants of our army and navy are looked after by regularly appointed chaplains. In our Isthmian "Canal Strip," there will be engaged many thousands of souls for whose welfare, both material and spiritual, we shall be accountable. Not only must we preserve their bodies as far as possible from the ravages of plague and endemic fevers, but we must look after their morals as well. Abuses, sometimes of the most frightful sort, are apt to show themselves in a great camp that has no spiritual shepherd. The "Canal Strip" should have such a shepherd—a chaplain who can preach to these laborers the plain Gospel of Jesus Christ, without denominational or sectarian limitations, and whose influence will make itself a power for good morals and decent living throughout the "Strip."

We trust that the wisdom and importance of such a provision will be recognized in the proper quarter, and that our rule in the Isthmian Canal belt will be a vast improvement on the morals of the "old regime."

Misfit Families

MISFIT families are not so numerous as pessimists would have us fancy, but they are to be found in almost every street. They are composed of people who are incompatible in temper and uncongenial in behavior, and who have not enough of either philosophy or religion to get on together, without friction and antagonism. If it happen that in our home there is one person who darkens the sky by her cloudy words, or another who disturbs the peace by dynamite explosiveness, and if, in God's Providence, there is no other home to which this peculiar person can go, then she must be accepted and borne with. Never should her frailties and foibles be exposed to the public. Every family should turn the key upon its skeleton, if there be one, and keep its infelicities, small and great, from the knowledge of the neighbors. Nothing is gained by exploiting one's misfortunes, and if there is a basis of love and self-respect, even a misfit family may secure a good measure of contentment as the days go on.

"THE WHITE DOOR"

OUR hearts are filled with gratitude to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have strengthened our faith, when we hardly knew which way to turn, by their timely aid. We are dependent upon our Christian friends for our support, because we are distinctly known as the Gospel Settlement. We are free to admit that there is but one remedy for the misery and sin in this overcrowded district, and we feel that it is to the power and beauty of the Gospel that the great success of the work is due. All who come to us must find sympathy and counsel, and loving interests as individuals, not as a class or club, and so "The White Door" has won the confidence of the neighbors. They feel sure of a welcome, where ills will be looked after, where justice will be found.

We have over ten hundred on our lists, who are watching the success of this Christian Home in this neighborhood, and we trust that our friends will not let it fail. We thank you heartily for your kind generosity in the past and ask your further support until we have an endowment fund, and are not dependent each year, as now, upon voluntary contributions. SARAH J. BIRD.

Run on a Prosperous Bank

AN amusing cause is assigned for a two days' run on a prosperous Bank on the East Side of New York, a few days ago. It is a Bank largely patronized by the Hebrews of that section, nd has deposits on hand aggregating ten million dollars. became known in the neighborhood that deposits ade in the Bank on or before January 10, would draw terest from January 1. The news stirred up the provi- ent depositors to get all the money they could into the ank before that day. Long lines of people eager to ake deposits stretched out from the teller's window nto the street. Some newly-arrived Hebrews, and me who were more ignorant than the others, noticed e crowd at the Bank's doors, and drew the inference at the Bank was in trouble. These waiting throngs, ith bank-books in their hands, appeared to their im- gination to be depositors waiting to get their money.

Rapidly the rumor spread, until thousands who had oney in the institution were wild with fear of losing t. When the Bank closed in the evening, two police- en were put on guard. Two hours later a frenzied nob had gathered that swept the two guardians off their feet. A detail of thirty-five officers was sent, and these had hard work to keep the wild people from breaking into the Bank. The janitor put a notice in Yiddish in the window, assuring the people that there was no difficulty, and that anyone wanting to draw money could do so in the morning. But the people did not credit the statement, and hundreds of them remained before the building all night.

In the morning, the Bank opened its doors an hour before the usual time, and soon the tenements were sending out troops of wild-eyed Hebrews, chiefly Russians, clamoring and gesticulating, all on their way to the Bank to get their money. The Bank officials had anticipated the run, and had drawn $400,000, chiefly in silver, from the sub-treasury. Offers of help came from other banks, ranging from a million to smaller sums, but they were not needed. As fast as the tellers could count the money the depositors were paid, in sums of five to sixteen hundred dollars. The people were warned that they were forfeiting their interest, but they were not deterred. The crowd increased, and the pressure became so great that the policemen on guard were crushed against the railings, and even the railings were bent and loosened from their fastenings. Not even the sight of an express wagon loaded with sacks of silver dollars inspired them with confidence. Bearded men, talking excitedly, and women with infants in their arms, were in the crowd. The Bank kept its doors open an hour after the usual hour of closing, paying every applicant as fast as the books were presented. At the close of business the panic had subsided. The fact that every one who could reach the teller's window had been paid, renewed confidence, and on the following morning the premises resumed their normal appearance. Many were eager to return their money to the Bank's keeping, but they were refused, the Bank having had enough of such panicky customers. One can but wish that men and women, who are so distressed by the mere suspicion that their little hoards are unsafe, would take the advice of our Lord:

Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal (Matthew 6: 20).

Impurities Utilized

The common complaints against the operators of paper mills, that they pollute the rivers and streams into which their waste materials run, promises soon to be a thing of the past, if the reports of a recent discovery are confirmed. Some months ago a company engaged in the wood pulp manufacture on the Ausable River, at Ausable Forks, N. Y., began an experiment with a new process for reclaiming the waste products from the mill. The process consists of vacuum evaporation and was invented by a man in their employ. In the first test, one-eighth of the waste from the mill was handled, and the results were very satisfactory. The nasty black fluid from the digesters was turned into a thick, black molasses-like material, which is valuable for paper sizing. As a result of this process the water came out as clear as crystal and with all impurities from the mill removed. After another test, more successful than the first, the company decided to adopt the process, and the work of erecting a plant for a further and more extended test has been commenced. If the impurities that are so mischievous and injurious to health can be turned to useful account, the benefit will be enormous. When that is done in the moral and spiritual world, the effect is as astonishing as it is blessed.

I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry; who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious (I Tim. 1:12, 13).

A Miner Delivered

A romantic story, scarcely credible, but vouched for by a reliable traveler, comes from a mining camp in Minnesota. According to his report, one of the prospectors was holding on to a claim that he was convinced would eventually prove rich. He was ridiculed for his faith in it, but was liked by the other miners. Recently he fell sick, and was in sore straits. One day, a friend brought him some food, which the miner shared with his sole companion, a mongrel dog, to whom he was much attached. The man who brought the food was annoyed at seeing the miner give any of it to the dog, and said he did not mind bringing food to a man, but objected to bring it for a dog. After he was gone, the miner, reflecting on his remark, came to the conclusion that he would lose popularity in the camp if he did not part with his dog. He therefore, with reluctance, drove the animal away. After some time, the dog returned with a bone that he had dug up. As the miner watched him gnawing it, he saw a glittering mark on the bone, the significance of which he understood. It took him but a few minutes to find the hole from which his canine friend had extracted the bone, and there was the gold he had sought so long. The hole led back to a shelf of rock which was rich in the precious metal. He has already taken out a large quantity, and has the prospect of gaining an enormous fortune. Whether the story is true we know not, but success has often come to men in ways as strange. It has sometimes happened, too, that a man of learning and culture has found the way to spiritual riches through the guidance of a child, or a humble friend, whose intellect and education were far inferior to his own.

God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world and things which are despised, hath God chosen (I. Cor. 1: 27, 28).

BRIEF NOTES

Eighteen of the 226 members chosen for the next Massachusetts House of Representatives first saw the light in foreign lands. All except two of these were born in Great Britain, and six were born in Ireland.

Japanese doctors never accept fees from poverty-stricken patients. In Japan there is a proverb, that when the twin enemies, disease and poverty, invade a home, he who accepts money from its inmates is a robber.

In a single steamer landing at Philadelphia recently, 550 passengers were Russians, most of whom were able bodied men between twenty and thirty years of age. They were fleeing from compulsory service in the Russian army.

Dr. L. W. Munhall is beginning this week a revival campaign in Jacksonville, Fla. Eleven churches unite in the movement. A tabernacle, with a seating capacity of five thousand, has been erected. Dr. Munhall has accepted the invitation of the Ocean Grove Association to conduct the Bible Class next summer.

Highly Appreciated

Please accept my thanks for the highly appreciated premiums received with the ever welcome CHRISTIAN HERALD. THE HEART OF THE WORLD

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF OPENING CHAPTERS

Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., of the aristocratic St. Cecilia Metropolitan Church, is a pastor with broad humanitarian views of life. He has found time amid the duties of his ministry to write a book, entitled, The Christian Socialist, which has just been published under the nom de plume of "Mark Burns." It excites a tremendous sensation. His secret of the authorship is known only to Miss Mildred Rodney, his betrothed, who has divined it. The book excites mingled praise and antagonism, and is the topic of the hour. The conservative element denounce it as dangerous to society. Judge Rodney is especially bitter. Next winter, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton is chosen as bishop. A distinguished audience assembles in St. Cecilia's, to witness the consecration. At the critical moment, the pastor makes an open avowal of the authorship of the offending book. Bishops, clerics, and audience are stricken dumb with amazement. His ecclesiastical career is regarded as ended. Miss Rodney, notwithstanding some parental opposition, consents to marry Stanton, and the two begin to face the world together bravely.

Meanwhile, a great strike is going on at Lenox, and Stanton is invited to address the Union men, by Bruce Harvey, their president. He advocates Christian love and forbearance, instead of violence, but the meeting is stampeded by the news of a riot at the mills. Stanton and Harvey go there with the crowd, but cannot preserve order. In the riot several are killed and many injured. Stanton rescues a poor negro worker from the furious mob, but is himself badly hurt in doing so. He and Harvey become fast friends. Harwood, and Wrightam are two millionaire mill-owners, whose hard and oppressive measures have embittered the workers. Stanton resolves to plead with them for a better understanding, as both are church members and professing Christians. He calls on Wrightam, but meets with a decided rebuff. With Harwood he has more success, and the two become good friends. Harwood has a great domestic sorrow, which takes the sweetness out of all his business triumphs. He leaves his wealthy home and friends, and disguised, goes to work as a mill-hand.

Stanton meanwhile is becoming well known as an advocate of Christian Socialism, and is a frequent lecturer. He meets many queer characters among the workers, and much appreciation. The troubles at Lenox continue, and he arrives there one day just in time to find a mob about to burn a negro who is accused of murder. Stanton determines to thwart the lynchers, but is knocked senseless, and the negro is burned. Next day the real culprits are found, and the negro victim is shown to have been wholly inno cent. There is a popular revulsion of feeling in favor of Stanton. On the following Sunday he preaches in one of the leading pulpits, by invitation, and takes the lynching for his topic. Some people in the audience take exception to certain remarks by the speaker, as unpatriotic, and there is a momentary interruption, during which many leave the hall. Stanton then quietly concludes his discourse. While visiting the Company's mill, Stanton witnesses a heroic act by a worker, who saves Harvey's life by imperiling his own. He recognizes the worker as Harwood. Harwood dies of his injuries, and Harvey, an hour later, learns the true story of his heroic rescue. Harvey, on recovering, seeks Stanton's society and counsel, and is apparently deeply interested in religion.

HARVEY at last understood Stanton's silence and ceased his invective. When they parted for the night he said with a smile: I guess we broke about even. The Second Presbyterian is on your side of the argument, and Saint Cecilia on mine."

They had visited two different Sunday Schools, and Harvey had also frankly confessed his surprise at what he had noted in those schools.

"The Sunday Schools, how about them?" Harvey replied. "I haven't been to a Sunday School since I was a boy. It looks like a great improvement to me. I'll concede that much."

For the next two months, Stanton and Harvey faithfully visited all the preaching services, Sunday Schools and prayer-meetings they could attend. Twice Stanton was recognized. Once Harvey met a number of mill men in a mission established by one of the churches. In all, they succeeded in visiting twenty-five different churches, most of them Harvey's selection. Lenox had over one hundred Protestant Church buildings and a Catholic Cathedral. This latter they also visited, and each man in his own fashion was impressed by what he saw there.

At the end of the time, Harvey confessed to Stanton that the experiment had been an eye-opener to him.

"I'll give in to you on part of what you say. Some of these churches seem to be doing first-rate service. That prayer-meeting at the Second Presbyterian is a surprise to me. I had no idea there was such an institution in Lenox. And the same is true of the First Baptist and the First Christian. I don't know as I feel particularly struck with any of the preaching, but it seemed to me most of it was sincere enough and—well—I'm willing to concede I was mistaken on several counts, because I didn't know."

Stanton was naturally pleased with Harvey's confession.

"I wish every workingman in the mills could have the same experience, Harvey. Only two days ago I heard some of the men sneering at preachers as a useless quantity, in the profession for the social distinction, the ease and the laziness of it, and so forth. Why, do you know, Harvey, you do know, that scores of foreman in the mills get higher wages to-day than half the ministers in Lenox, and do not for one minute begin to lead such self-denying lives. The ministers of Lenox, on the average, spend ten times as much money and time in relieving distress and helping the poor of Lenox and of other countries, as the mill owners or operatives ever think of spending. The average salary of the ministers in the United States is less than a thousand dollars a year, and it certainly cannot be said of the majority of them that they are selfish money-seekers or social parasites, yet you and the majority of mill men and what you call the wage-earners, are always bitter or indifferent toward the ministry, as if you had a special grudge against them, and you have no use for the Church, about which most of you know absolutely nothing. Do you think it is strange, if after a good many years of this sort of treatment from the masses, the hard-working, self-denying men and women in the churches, both ministers and members, begin to get a little restive, and think it is about time something was said about the selfishness and narrowness of the trade-unions and the labor movement generally? Instead of asking the old question, 'Why don't the Churches reach the masses?' some of us begin to think it is time to change it to this, 'Why don't the masses join the Church which Jesus loved, and do as he commanded them?' Instead of that you know, Harvey, your trade-union organization is just as selfish a thing as the mill company ever was. You say you are fighting for your rights. But in doing it you pay very little attention to the rights of anyone else."

"These be strong words, Brother Stanton," said Harvey, his dark eyes glowing.

"But they are true," Stanton said vigorously. "Your trade-union as it exists in Lenox is a Godless institution. You are after nothing but bread alone. You do not have any higher motive than Wrightam and his tribe have, and the result of your success, as his has been, is emptiness and bitterness of soul. Harvey, the whole of this Labor and Capital struggle is a terrible comment on the unregenerated man. I see no hope for its final settlement right until it is settled on the basis of a real brotherly love between men, and neither Labor or Capital knows anything about this yet. It is a strife, a battle, a struggle between two great forces. The essential factor of Love is not present in the mind or thought of either side. It does not exist in their hearts."

"May be you are right." Harvey said, much to Stanton's surprise. "But perhaps we have not reached that phase of our evolution yet. The most we can do at present is to fight power with power. Maybe the love will come afterwards."

"It is not the way to arrive at it," Stanton answered with a sigh. Their conference ended and they parted for a time, Harvey to complete the organization of the Union, which was about to dictate new terms to the company, and Stanton to go out again on a new lecture engagement, which took him into several large cities.

During his absence from home he grew more and more impressed with the truth he had tried to impress on Harvey. The only real hope for a better society was the regenerated individual. Coming back to Lenox after an absence of three weeks, he took counsel with the pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church and a few other ministers and prominent layman, all good, earnest men, and the result was that within two weeks, Stanton, assisted by these men, had begun a series of evangelistic meetings in the old Rink down by the mills.

Never had the power of the Holy Spirit been so manifest from the beginning, as in these meetings, which became afterwards famous in the annals of Lenox history. Night after night the old building was crowded, and Stanton preached a simple but profound Gospel of Love. Hundreds of the mill men began to respond to his appeal, made every night, to accept Christ as Lord and Master in every act of life. There was no cheap and noisy excitement. Sometimes over the breathless audience the Spirit's power and presence were so manifest that the most ignorant scoffers felt them and were melted to tears and resolve. Even the Lenox Times conceded, that never before in its history had Lenox witnessed such a remarkable religious experience.

It was in the meeting at the close of the first week of this manifestation of divine presence, that Stantor first saw Harvey. He had not been present before tc Stanton's knowledge. He waited until the service was over and the last man gone. His manner was full of repressed excitement, and Stanton easily saw that Harvey's former friendship, amounting even to a brotherly esteem, had all disappeared.

In place of the old attitude was a hard, angry manner, that made no effort at concealment.

The two men were alone in the building, except for the janitor, who was at the other end of the room attending to some of his duties preparatory to closing up.

Harvey came near to Stanton, and in a voice of passion exclaimed, "These meetings have got to stop! They are interfering with my plans! And either you or I, Mr. Stanton, have got to answer for it. But in any case, I say the meetings have got to stop!"

Stanton made no reply immediately, but looked at Harvey calmly.

CHAPTER VIII

AFTER a little, Stanton said, "Do you realize what you are saying?"

"Perfectly well. I say these meetings have got to stop."

Again Stanton looked at Harvey silently. Harvey stepped up a little nearer, menacingly. Then it was that Stanton smelt the fumes of liquor and understood that he had been drinking. The knowledge of this fact explained Harvey's unusual excitement; but it disturbed Stanton deeply, as he had never known Harvey to be guilty of the habit. If he had been sober he would not be in any doubt as to the right course to take with him. As it was he was in the dark, and the uncertainty in his mind left only one thing clear. That was to avoid a quarrel in which he should be obliged to regret any act of his own in the after-time when Harvey had come to his senses.

"Harvey, these meetings are now in the control of more than human forces. It is not in my power or yours to stop them. It is God's work, and must go on."

"But I say they must stop! Do you hear? Stop! The men are getting away from me. What right have you to step between the men and me? There are over 5,000 men who have been subject to my orders. No man on earth shall rob me of this power. I got it by hard knocks, and you nor any other man has a right to take it away from me."

"How do these meetings interfere with your plans, Brother Harvey?" Stanton asked, thinking that possibly Harvey would be led on to a recital of supposed grievances which could be answered.

"How do they!" Harvey exclaimed angrily. "Listen to me. The Lenox company is about to consolidate the mills at Oreville. But in doing it they will reduce the force here to 3,000 men. That will throw over 2,000 men out of work. The Union at Oreville, together with the one here in Lenox, is strong enough, financially, to start a co-operative mill company of its own. We have a combined capital enough to build and operate our own plant. We have the skilled labor to run it after it is built. Why should we slave for J. B. Wrightam & Co., when we can work on our own account for our mutual profit. My plan has been to strike both here and at Oreville. Then force the fight on the company and let it know we are not dependent on it. If possible, to cripple it by a withdrawal of every skilled workman. The plan of the Lenox company to drop 2,000 men is a cold-blooded scheme to reduce the output and bring up prices on the product. I've not made our plan public yet. But these meetings are weaning the men away from it. Hundreds are not willing to agree to it now." Harvey struggled nearer and raised his arm threateningly. "Mr. Stanton, no man loves power more than I do. I've lived all my life to get it, and I don't intend to lose it through the snivelling drivel of evangelist revival meetings. I say these meetings must stop. It's up to you and me now."

The janitor of the building had finished his work at the end of the room, and was coming down towards the platfrom to put out some lights there.

Stanton, for the first time in his life, was deeply and honestly perplexed. At the heart of his perplexity there was also a profound sorrow. He had been growig to love Harvey, and had looked forward to the an's development along the personal Christian way life. The whole aspect of the unexpected situation at now confronted him was in the nature of a shock at came so suddenly as to leave him unprepared.

But he called out to the janitor. "William, I want to e this brother alone for a while. Won't you kindly ait in the coat-room until we are through?"

The janitor, who was used to the habit of the after-nferences which had been a feature of the meetings, rned aside into the coat-room, and Stanton breathed sier at the removal of a witness to the act he now ared.

He turned to Harvey and smiled in his old fashion, ying his hand on Harvey's arm, they were so near.

"Brother, no wrong can come to the men or you be-use of these meetings. Your plan, if right, will not ffer in the end if God's will is done by you and the en. Leave the outcome with him. I cannot stop ese meetings. The breath of God is in them. It ould be blasphemy to attempt it. It would——"

"Take that, you coward—you preacher!" Harvey ddenly yelled, and with the words he struck Stan-on twice, savagely, on the mouth.

Fredrick Stanton had always preached the doc-ine of non-resistance, but he had never been called on to practice it in a concrete form. e was fully Harvey's equal in physical rength and courage. He was his su-erior under the conditions that were ow true of Harvey. For one brief in-ant the primitive man in him surged p red-handed, and all the hot-blooded avage in him cried out to give blow or blow. When that instant passed, it ft him standing still, outwardly pale, ut as rigid and immovable as a stone.

Harvey had stepped back as if, as a natter of course, expecting attack.

"Why don't you fight, preacher? strike me. It's your turn now!"

"Harvey!" Stanton's voice thrilled ven through the drunken, maddened enses of the labor leader. "I shall ever strike you. 'Vengeance is mine. will repay, saith the Lord.'"

And then there took place a strange hing, as unexplained afterwards by oth men as if it had been in the realm f other world powers. Stanton took Harvey by the arm, and, not being con-scious that he was using any unusual strength, he led him to the door at the ear of the platform, out through the small room, and through that out upon the street. Harvey went as if dazed, uttering no word, making no struggle. Like one in a waking dream he stag-gered down the street, and Stanton, af-ter watching him a moment, went back into the little room and kneeled a few moments, wiping off the blood from his lips as he prayed:

"O God, for Christ's sake, give me this man for my hire! Forgive him, Lord, he knew not what he did! O grant thy presence with all these poor creatures. O give the world that which alone can heal its hurts, and bind up its social wrongs with thy peace."

All through his prayer there floated the vision of the world that went its careless way, heedless of the passion of the Son of God; but a song went with the vision, and its recurrent refrain was one of hope and final victory.

When he went home he meant to keep the incident from Mildred, but the cut on his lips continued to bleed, and he told her everything.

She was deeply agitated. Since their marriage, Mildred Rodney had grown to believe in her great strong husband with more and better faith. Their married life had contained elements of pain. The estrange-ment she had suffered in the break between her mother and herself had left its mark upon her in spite of all her effort. Some of the things her husband had done since his entrance on the public life she tried to share with him, had not seemed to her always the best and wisest; but not for one instant had she doubted his ability, his power, or his unswerving fidelity to his convictions. Every event in his career added to her passionate devotion to him. The world for her had no other love equal to the one she embodied in him. She dressed his wound, and cried over him a little as she listened to his story.

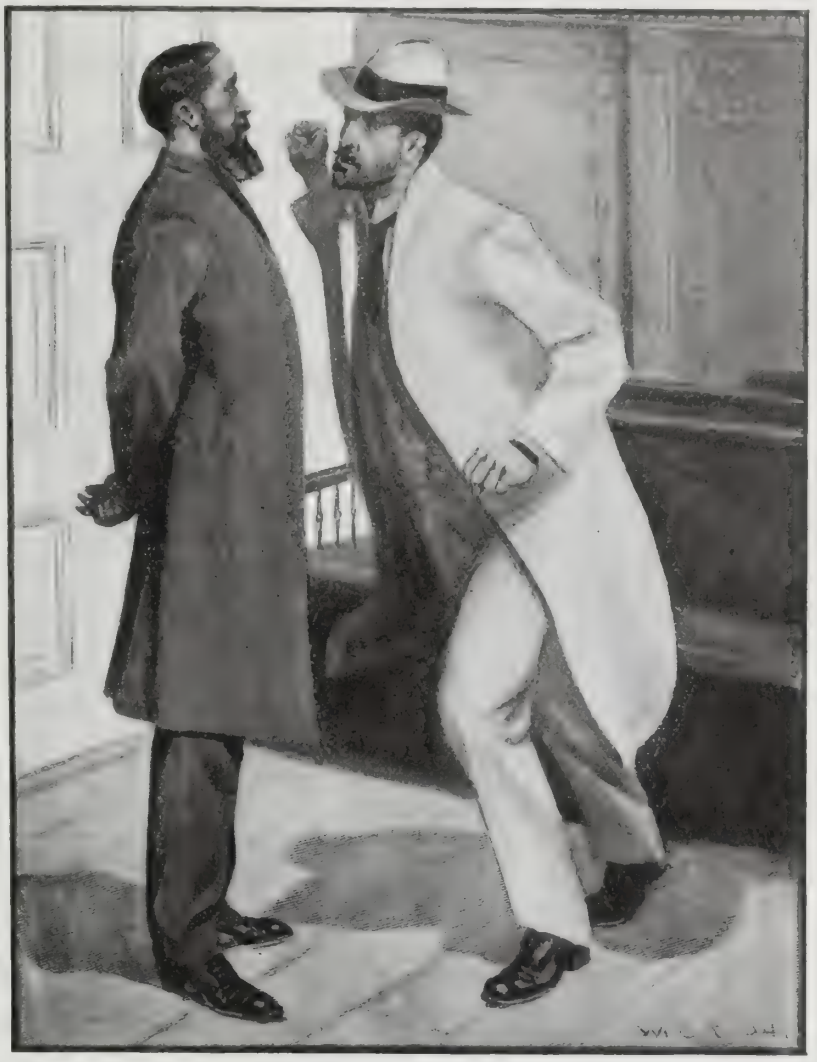
"This is something no one need know except Harvey and ourselves. It is nothing. He will be sorry, and, if I mistake not, he will say so. Let it all work out."

Yet not even Stanton, strong in the boundless affec-tion of his wife, and sanguine of the future, antici-pated Harvey's action into the old circle of friendship which had been so suddenly broken.

The next evening was Friday, and Stanton went down to the meeting, feeling that it had reached a crisis. And truly never had Lenox witnessed such manifestations of the Holy Spirit's presence in the world. The old Rink was packed to its utmost limits. The sense of a physical silence was so vivid that those who were present confessed the next day that the ex-perience was absolutely new. Yet what less than this should the Christian expect? The supernatural pres-ence is definitely promised by the Son of God to his disciples. It is the shame of Christendom that it con-tinues to be so ignorant of this power after twenty centuries of the fact. And thousands are as much surprised and awed at the fact of the Holy Spirit's power as the scientists who find radium, or the world that thrills over a new-found element, which has al-ways been in existence, but has only within a few months been found out.

Hundreds of men remained that night to confess Jesus Christ as Master. Stanton worked with them, emotion strong within him; but he was not hysterical or foolishly excited. All his senses responded with alert, sane, well-poised eagerness as he thanked God for answer to his prayers. He had longed to see such a day. The results were what he had always believed were necessary to the establishment of any real Broth-erhood.

The next evening there was no meeting at the Rink. Saturday night had been reserved for rest. Sunday Stanton was to preach by invitation in his old pulpit.



"HE STRUCK STANTON TWICE, SAVAGELY, ON THE MOUTH"

Dr. Sayers was out of the city, and the pulpit supply committee had urgently asked Stanton to take his place.

The invitation had moved Stanton, and touched him deeply. He knew well enough that in Saint Cecilia there was a strong and powerful opposition to his con-victions on the social question. But on the other hand, even in that centre of ecclesiastical formality and Christless Christianity, there were souls that were trying to find the light. He could name a few promi-nent business men who were honestly disturbed over their duties and responsibilities towards the men they employed. There was also a large group of young people in Saint Cecilia with whom Stanton had always been familiar and popular. They had always regretted his resignation, and some of them, like the young col-legian Arthur Harwood, had imbibed Stanton's theo-ries.

As he rose to preach that Sunday morning he was touched at the sight of the great audience, where even the faces of those who opposed him seemed to look kindly at him. Wrightam was there, much to Stan-ton's surprise. Wrightam belonged to another church, and Stanton did not remember ever seeing him in Saint Cecilia before.

The remarkable meetings at the Rink had made an impression on all Lenox. Even Saint Cecilia had shared in the interest and the results of that out-pouring of the Holy Spirit. But Stanton's heart longed for a manifestation of that power with the other end of society. Why should the Gospel be preached in revivals to the masses, the workingmen, the crowds of poor and outwardly depraved and sinful, and there be no revival services for the silk and satin-clothed, for the people that wore diamonds and lived in marble faced houses and rode in automobiles and yachts and kept several servants? Did they not need revivals as much as any mill operative or saloon-keeper or gambler or fallen woman? Did not J. B. Wrightam, the magnate, who broke the Golden Rule in business every day of his life, need to be converted just the same as Johnny Parr, the Lenox gambler, who had fleeced the young men of Lenox off and on for twenty years? What was the difference? Wright-am was a captain of industry, who manipulated com-mercial enterprises in such a way that half the stock in the concerns was watered, and when the slump came, Wrightam and his few friends on the inside of the deal pocketed the immense profits while the smaller concerns went bankrupt, and individuals were ruined by the hundred; Parr played cards and roulette and faro with his victims, and by manipu-lating the gambling machines so as to make the machines win in the long run, pocketed the profits. The only dif-ference between the robbery of Wright-am's gambling and Parr's, was simply this: Wrightam had more capital, and his hold-up of the public was on a lar-ger, more spectacular scale. In other words, he stole more from the public than Parr did. Was that the reason Parr was not admitted to the respecta-ble church and society circles, and Wrightam was? Yet on the unques-tioned witness of those who knew the dishonest and brazen robbery of some of our well-known captains of industry in America to-day, these commercial gamblers have been guilty of theft on such large scale, that, according to Presi-dent Hadley of Yale, there is need to-day of a social boycott of grafters in high places. President Hadley, in his stric-tures on the high-class gambler and pirate in commercial circles, calls at-tention to the fact that in Dante's In-ferno, the worst punishment falls upon those people who use positions of power and trust to make money for themselves.

All these thoughts mingled in Stan-ton's mind as he preached that morn-ing. And his message was Christ's message to men of wealth and respon-sibility. Taking the life of Harwood for his text, he related as much as was public of the man's strange experience, and gave a graphic picture of his life as an operative in Lenox lower mill. He then went on to speak of the possibili-ties that the present situation in Lenox offered to both Labor and Capital to come together on a basis of brotherly love.

"The Holy Spirit is here in Lenox to-day, as truly as he was in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. He has reached by his marvelous power, hundreds of men who work with their hands in the mills. What of the men who direct the labor? What of the men and women of wealth and social position, who, if they will only let God use them, can now meet these forces of Labor, and remove the causes of strife and hatred that now exists? The spirit pleads with you, rich, cultured men and women of Lenox to-day. It is not my voice you hear. I am but a poor and insignificant voice trying to make his message to you clear. Within this church society are over a hundred men and women whose combined wealth is easily reckoned to be over fifty millions of dollars. This is God's money. It does not belong to you. Many of you are spending it in ways that are not pleasing to the owner of it. You are wasting it in foolish amusements, in useless lux-uries and (I say it in love), in sinful extravagances, God calls on you here to-day to lay these riches in con-secrated offerings at his feet. As in the first days of the history of the Christian Church, so now the test of your Christian discipleship consists in the proof you give to Christ of following him in everything, of giv-ing to God in service all that you have."

Stanton went on, and in the plainest language spared not. He talked out the plain truth concerning the sins of that great, fashionable church. He called commer-cial dishonesty by its right name. He pleaded with the people to confess their sins of pride and self-in-gence, and haughtiness and lack of brotherly love. He closed his sermon by referring again to Harwood, who was never so truly great as when he gave his own life to save another.

EVANGELIST N'LULI AND HIS FAMILY

A GATHERING OF NATIVES AT THE OPENING OF A NEW CHURCH IN MASHONALAND

MASHONA WOMEN AND CHILDREN

A CHURCH IN A HEATHEN VILLAGE

YOUR readers will be glad to hear of continued blessing on our work here. Last Wednesday, I went out to open a new church in a heathen kraal. We had a blessed time. Early in the day, the native heathen began to congregate, the women with their babies on their backs, and the men with their assegais and battle-axes in their hands.

The chief came at noon. After an interview with him, the signal was given for service in the church. The people crowded in, and, native-like, squatted down on the floor, packing it to its utmost capacity. Those who could not get in, thronged the doorway and the windows.

We made the service very simple, singing three hymns in the Chiswini language, and calling on two of our native Christians to engage in prayer. Taking for our text John 3: 16, we gave a plain statement of the plan of salvation. Mr. Carson, who accompanied me, followed with a short address on the same subject. The whole service lasted about an hour, and the heathen seemed greatly impressed. We felt that the Spirit was present to apply the message.

Afterwards the people assembled at a feast of meat. It was interesting to see them sitting around the fires in groups, roasting the meat.

NATIVE MASHONA WOMEN AND CHILDREN GOING TO CHURCH

Since returning, the evangelist has come in to tell me that there was one co vert on Sunday. For this we praise God. This is a proof of our faith. We were n looking for results so soon, but God putting his seal on the work.

Will THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reade pray for the evangelist, David N'luli a his wife, and for the people of this kraa I am enclosing some pictures. The chur is the usual wattle-and-daub building.

I will send you shortly a description a missionary journey into a part of t country where the people had never hea the name of Jesus, and had never seen missionary before. R. WODEHOUSE.

A Child's Promise

Chaplain Cyrus Townsend Brady tells this i teresting anecdote:

I want to tell a little incident that shows th value of a word in season, even though it be a dressed to a very little child. The other Sunda it was very snowy and inclement. His mothe held the following conversation with Barrett, th little boy in your office not long ago with me, i whom you gave the Testament.

MAMMA. "I wouldn't go to Sunday School t day if I were you, Barrett. It's too bad for litt boys to be out."

BARRETT. "But I have to go."

MAMMA. "Why do you have to go?"

BARRETT. "Because I promised Dr. Klopsch would go to Sunday School for five years, and have to do it, and he gave me a prayer book."

"I hadn't the slightest idea that the child re membered the incident even, until that came out

The New Wonderful N-Rays

BY SAMUEL G. TRACY, B.Sc., M.D., NEW YORK

THE Roentgen or X-rays were discovered in 1895, and they have proved of great importance to the scientific and medical world. The Becquerel rays were discovered in 1896, and are obtained from several substances, the most prominent of which is the ore pitchblende. From this latter substance, Mme. Curie first extracted radium in 1901.

Now the scientists are interested in the new and wonderful discovery of Prof. M. P. Blondlot, of the faculty of Nancy, France. This discovery he calls the N-rays, and he obtained evidence of them in certain bodies, such as tempered steel, hammered brass and crystallized sulphur. The method of demonstrating the N-rays is comparatively simple. Take a fluorescent screen, made by applying a thin layer of zinc-blende, to a small, square cardboard, and expose the same to the ultra violet light, sunlight, or a bright electric light. The zinc-blende on this screen will now be found to be luminous in a dark room. After a few minutes, the light of the screen is lessened, and practically remains in a stable and lowered state for some time. While still in the dark, bring a piece of tempered steel, or hammered brass, near the fluorescent screen, and, in some mysterious way, the light of the screen is increased. This phenomenon is produced by several metals and other substances, such as certain kinds of glass and quartz. The sun is thought to be one great source of the N-rays, and certain objects when exposed to it seem to absorb the rays. When any of these objects are subjected to strain, they emit the N-rays. Thus, tempered steel, owing to the arrangement of the particles composing it, is at all times in a state of strain, and continually giving off the rays. It would appear these rays are limitless, for Professor Blondlot, experimenting with a sword blade made in the time of Charlemagne (770 A.D.) found it exhibited the N-ray phenomenon, when brought near the zinc-blende screen.

Another experiment made by this French scientist was as follows: A fluorescent screen, previously excited, was placed on a table in a dark room. The approach of a steel file altered the appearance of the hazy, luminous spots on the screen and caused them to appear more distinct.

Again, when an electric spark passed in a Nernst lamp, and the source of the N-rays was two inches distant, there were placed between these two points several sheets of aluminum, zinc, cardboard, etc. Professor Blondlot was now able to take an N-ray photograph in fifty seconds through the various thicknesses of the substances. This experiment may be repeated by a Welsbach burner, with light radiations shut out.

The most astonishing discovery in connection with the N-rays, is that of Professor Charpentier, who claims that the human body gives out these radiations, particularly by the contraction of muscles, and the excitation of nerve centres. He says when a fluorescent screen is applied over the centre of speech in a man who is talking in an animated manner, the luminosity of the screen is increased at that point. This is due to increased "N" radiations in that area of the brain. No doubt when other brain centres are stimulated, a like luminositv will appear on the fluorescent screen if it is held in close proximity to the brain.

Professor Charpentier claims that in a half-darkened room, that objects in view become more visible when the N-rays are projected onto the eye, from a piece of tempered steel. Thus far I have confirmed but two of Blondlot and Charpentier's experiments, namely, the one of increased luminosity of the fluorescent screen in a dark room when a piece of tempered steel was brought near it; and the other, of being able to see objects more clearly in a partially darkened room, when the N-rays were projected onto the eye from a piece of tempered steel.

These experiments with the N-rays, particularly those relating to the human body and mind, are interesting from more than one point of view. Apart from the fact that living tissues apparently emit radiations, it is quite within the scope of possibility to think that such radiations, under special conditions, are capable of affecting other living bodies. Possibly in the scientific explanations of the N-rays, we may find the true reason of the phenomenon to which the name "telepathy" has been given. Certainly, there are many intelligent men who believe we can be affected by thought radiations, and emanations from individuals at a distance who are in sympathy with us. To those who believe in thought transference, the N-rays may offer a rational physical explanation of the same, and thus supersede many of the superstitious theories which are now held concerning it. As yet, however, the existence of the N-rays is accepted by comparatively few scientists. Among those who are in accord with Blondlot and Charpentier, are Mace de Leprenay of Marseilles, France, and M. Jean Becquerel of Paris. Opposed to the French scientists is Prof. R. W. Wood, of England, who says: "After spending many hours in Blondlot's laboratory witnessing many experiments, I am unable to report a single observation which would appear to indicate the existence of the N-rays."

I am of the opinion that further research in the realm of N-rays will reveal that there is more than a grain of truth in the claims of Blondlot and Charpentier. I believe that the causes of some of the mental and physic phenomena will be made clear through them and possibly the N-rays may prove of considerable service in medicine, particularly in the diagnosis and treatment of mental diseases.

An Open Letter to a Young Girl

MY dear Phyllis, your plaintive little letter came yesterday morning, and made me wish very much that you were near enough to run into my den, and have a talk with me. But as you are on one side of the continent and I am on the other, we must talk on paper, and here is my answer:

You tell me that Strephon, who seems to me a rather fickle and conceited youth who needs taking down a peg, has been "paying attentions" to you for a year and a-half. I gather that he has been your escort to evening meetings and parties, has gone with you on summer picnics and winter sleigh-rides, and has called at your home several evenings a week. It had come to be an understood thing among your friends, that you belonged to Strephon, and he to you. Although he had never definitely asked you to marry him, he had confided in you so far as to tell you his plans, the amount of his income, and the choice of the lot where he was to build his new house was left to you.

Practically, and wholly in your view of the matter, you were engaged to Strephon. Other young men kept away. You refused invitations from them if given. In the sort of informal pairing off, that in a country neighborhood assigns this girl to that man, and that man to this girl, it was assumed that Strephon and Phyllis would, so to speak, hunt in couples, just as it was assumed that John and Mary, Frank and Elsie, and the other young people would do.

Suddenly, without warning and without explanation, Strephon stops calling at your home, nods coldly when you meet him, and leaves you to go alone to sociables, or stay at home. Asked for an explanation (a great mistake dear; I would not have condescended so far myself), he gloomily tells you that he "has his reasons." You are broken-hearted. "What can I do," you plead, "to get him back? I love him so."

Women always have loved, and alway will love, till time shall end, men who are not fit to tie the latchet of their shoes. But if I could, I would urge girls like you, dear child, not to show your love too soon. In all sweet innocence, a young girl sometimes lets a youth see that she adores him, when, on the contrary, he should adore her, and she accept, not render homage. Many men are loyal, devoted, true. A few are inherently fickle and incapable of steadfastness. If Strephon's place is with the latter class you will be saved an immense amount of grief and pain by finding it out before marriage, instead of after it.

A girl should not permit a man to monopolize her, nor consider herself pledged to him, unless he has asked her to become his fiancee, and she has given consent, in words as well as in looks and implied hints. Then, her parents should be asked, too, and should ratify the transaction.

How are you to get him back, you ask. Oh, my dear Phyllis, I could find it in my heart to shake you. Don't for an instant try to get back a lover who even faintly shows that he is weary of you, does not find you interesting, and wants to go elsewhere. Possibly, the young girl from Chicago or New York or Boston, visiting at a neighbor's, has ensnared his wandering fancy. Perhaps Belle has a new hat or Lucy a new gown, in which she has looked so charming that Strephon forgot to see you, in your new gown or hat.

Whatever is at the bottom of his defection, hold your head up, and seem not to notice. If he is by way of passing your house as he goes to and from business, stay away from the windows at the time of his passing. Should you meet him anywhere, be civil, but do not overdo either coldness or courtesy. If he apologize for having been absent so long, affect a slight air of surprise that he bothers to explain. With perfect truth most girls can say that they have been busy, and that time does slip away fast. For pity's sake, never let Strephon imagine that you are wearing the willow on his account.

A man, much like your Strephon, told a girl friend of mine that he could not escort her to the skating-pond on a certain Saturday, he would be otherwise engaged. She smiled graciously, and said she hoped he would enjoy whatever he was going to do. (He had been her constant mate on the ice for weeks.) But did she stay at home? Not at all. When my lord arrived at the pond next day with his skates, there was my lady, skimming along like a bird, with the most agreeable young man in the village by her side, her cheeks rose-red, her eyes bright, her trim figure graceful and erect as ever. Strephon skated after her, and tried to make his peace, but he was not her partner that day.

Phyllis, I would not have you or any other young girl unduly vain or foolishly coquettish, but I would like to see you estimate yourself at a high valuation. I would like to see you gracious but not servile, gentle but not over-meek. No wonder young men cease to be chivalrous when young women reverse the right order, and are the wooers, not the wooed. Your friend,

PRUDENCE PAYSON.

SNOW-SHOEING IN THE WOODS

What gladness on a winter day,
To tread the drifts with fearless feet,
To tramp on snow-shoes down the way,
And some old rune of joy repeat.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—W. H. The story by Kipling, entitled "They," is in his last volume, Traffics and Discoveries. It cannot be literally explained or understood, except by the aid of imagination, as it is very subtle and delicately elusive. But it carries comfort to those who believe their dear little ones, who have gone to the other world, are not always very far away from us who linger here.

A Happy Thought

THIS happy thought is at the bottom of a great [illegible] of real delight that the children of a village ch[illegible] are having this winter. The pastor, wishing to k[illegible] his boys and girls, announces on Sabbath morning, tha[illegible] will be at home to the children on a designated afterno[illegible] from four to five o'clock. When the children call, [illegible] minister is there, in the parsonage, to receive them, [illegible] he sits down and talks to them in a sweet, elder-broth[illegible] fashion, which they find irresistible. This pastor belie[illegible] in winning to Christ the lambs of the flock. He covets [illegible] children before the world casts its shadow and weaves [illegible] spell, and in the familiar confidence of the childr[illegible] hour, he will lead many a young soul to its best Frie[illegible]

I sometimes wonder whether the home people sust[illegible] the minister as they ought in the hearing [illegible] sight of the children. When, for instance, [illegible] sermon is unfavorably criticised, or the pasto[illegible] censured for something that father or mot[illegible] considers a lack of tact, the children draw th[illegible] own conclusions. Ministers were once regar[illegible] with awe and treated with deference on acco[illegible] of their sacred office. The day of that ger[illegible] reverence is past. But would we not all do w[illegible] to revive in the presence of our children t[illegible] beautiful tradition of honor to the one who sta[illegible] to reveal the oracles of God in the sacred des[illegible] And the pastor, too, can he do better than [illegible] cultivate the children?

A Bygone Fashion

Little girls used to wear aprons, and as I [illegible] member a few years ago, mothers took gre[illegible] pride in making these little garments very dain[illegible] and pretty. They were ruffled or tucked [illegible] trimmed with embroidery. Sometimes they h[illegible] guimpes, as the little dresses have, with full bish[illegible] sleeves, and wide strings tied over the fulln[illegible] of the apron. A child always looked very dain[illegible] and sweet in a clean, white apron, and the apr[illegible] kept a good deal of soil from the dress benea[illegible] it. As I watch the little procession that pass[illegible] my window twice a day, I see no child weari[illegible] an apron. The woolen dresses appropriate [illegible] the chilly season have nothing to protect the[illegible] from dirt, ink spots, or any accident which m[illegible] happen in the course of the school day.

If some mother, with the courage of her opi[illegible] ions would start an apron crusade, other mothe[illegible] would have something to thank her for. A[illegible] apron is indispensable to women when doing the[illegible] work, or when sewing. It protects a nice gow[illegible] and enables a lady to undertake any work sh[illegible] wishes, and it keeps threads and bits of fluff fro[illegible] the dress when there is a sewing-bee in the hous[illegible] No wardrobe can be considered complete tha[illegible] has not its quota of aprons, either white o[illegible] colored. For kitchen use, a large apron o[illegible] gingham, which comes up on the breast with [illegible] bib, and fastens on the shoulders, and which i[illegible] long enough and full enough entirely to cove[illegible] the gown, is a real requisite. Elderly ladie[illegible] used to provide themselves with very daint[illegible] aprons of black silk with pockets, in which the[illegible] kept little things for convenience sake. A lad[illegible] of the old regime, preparing to meet a caller i[illegible] the afternoon, would step to the mirror, give he[illegible] hair a little brush, re-arrange collar and bow, pu[illegible] on her black silk apron, and descend, ready t[illegible] meet the most distinguished of her acquaintances

Outdoor Exercise

Women who are busy about the house, with the[illegible] multiform occupations of the kitchen, and the cooking, sweeping and other work which every day brings, are very apt to think that they can get on comfortably without much walking or being much outdoors. Especially in winter, when it requires time and trouble to put on the outdoor garments, when feet must be carefully shod, and overshoes and leggings added to the ordinary foot-gear, the housekeeper says to herself, "It is not worth while to go out." Particularly if she she lives in the country she hesitates. One reason why women who live in town have a higher health rate than women who live on the farm, is that the former get much more outdoor exercise than the latter. No amount of exertion indoors, equals a brisk tramp through any weather, and the exhilaration given by motion in the fresh air cannot be obtained by bed-making, sweeping, or other work done in the house. The vitality of one who is regularly out in the open air is higher than that of her who is shielded from every breath of the cold breezes and who coddles herself indoors.

The PEOPLE and THE PRESIDENT

What Others Think of Our Great National Symposium: A Stimulus to Greater Deeds and to Loftier Ideals

FEW publications dealing with great national questions have been more widely discussed, or more cordially approved, than the National Symposium on "The People and the President," ch appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Jan. 11. hat issue were published a large number of letters n leading statesmen, educators, financiers, divines, ologists, authors and others, in response to the ques- 1: "What is the most desirable thing to be hoped by the American people during the four years of sident Roosevelt's Administration?" Letters warmly plauding the Symposium and its purpose, and strongly orsing the views expressed by the eminent contribu-, have been received by this journal. We give ow extracts from a few of these communications:

Leads to Higher National Ideals

Hon. W. O. Smith, Member of Congress from Pennvania, writes:

"I have just read with interest and profit the Sympom, in the edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Jan. 11, itled, 'The People and the President,' and wish to ngratulate you on the enterprise and good judgment played in the publication of such weighty and edifyg matter. It not only stimulates the leaders of thought greater exertions and loftier ideals, but tends greatly exalt the aspirations and enrich the morals of the peo- . The general moral tone of your publication is so eet and wholesome in its educational tendencies, and, the same time, so delightfully instructive and enterining, that it gives me great pleasure to commend it to ose who have not made its acquaintance and become friends and patrons. W. O. SMITH."

Washington, D. C

U. S. Senator Joseph R. Hawley, Chairman Committee Military Affairs, writes through his secretary, that he as read the Symposium with great interest and comends it in the highest terms."

A Gospel of American Manhood

Hon. Henry M. Doremus, Mayor of Newark, N. J., rites:

"I have just been reading the last issue of THE CHRISIAN HERALD, and was much surprised to find between its overs one of the most excellent series of interviews or hort talks that it has been my pleasure to read for some me. Your idea is excellent, and the publication of the atter I have just referred to will, I am sure, bear fruit.

"I wonder how many people have read the interviews. hope you will see your way clear to spread the Gospel f American manhood as outlined so forcibly by your ontributors. HENRY M. DOREMUS."

Waken the Moral Sentiment of the Land

Congressman Willard D. Vandiver of the Committee n Naval Affairs, writes:

"The Symposium on 'The People and the President' is timely, and much of it is pertinent and ought to be beneficial.

"Many of the suggestions are good. They relate to two classes of subjects—the material progress and policy of the country, and the moral or social aspect of the people.

"What strikes me forcibly is that the former are presented with clearness and practicability and will be effective, because backed by personal interest which insures persistent effort; while the latter are mere expressions of pleasing sentiments, with as little persistence as a summer's breeze.

"The Panama Canal will be built in time, because there is money in it for many people. National or International Arbitration seems farther off than it was ten years ago. When the moral sentiment of Christendom is really awakened in earnest, statesmen listen to it as well as to the manufacturers of guns, armor-plate and battleships. But I see no sign of its being much in earnest. This is the real problem of the Christian patriot—to give practical form and persistency to the moral sentiment of mankind, to the end that morals should have their proper place as factors in the science of government.

Washington, D. C. "W. D. VANDIVER."

United States Senator J. C. Burrows, Chairman Committee on Privileges and Elections, writes:

"I have examined with care the copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 11, containing a Symposium entitled, 'The People and the President,' and found it intensely interesting. I am sure it will be of general interest to the reading public. J. C. BURROWS."

Washington, D. C.

W. A. Reeder (Member of Congress, 6th Kansas District), writes:

"I have read the Symposium. Such efforts must prove valuable forces for the advancement of the public welfare. It puts before a vast body of intelligent Christian people, in concise form, things which demand careful consideration. One of our very important problems is that of making it possible for poor families to locate upon land and draw their subsistence directly therefrom. While I do not expect the full accomplishment of such a work during this Administration, I do expect to see land grabbing by fraudulent or by legal means so effectually stopped, as to retain a large part of the public domain now remaining, for the use of those who will, in future, need it for homes."

Hon. Carlton McCarthy, Mayor of Richmond, Va., writes:

"I do not hesitate to say that such a publication ought to be greatly useful. I was particularly struck with the contribution of Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, who pleads for the recognition of the equal citizenship of the people of the North and of the South, and with the contribution of Rev. R. S. McArthur, especially his reference to the influence of the present national Administration on the elevation and improvement of municipal government."

Secretary Hay writes:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, D. C.

"I have read the Symposium with much interest. The wide diffusion of such a publication could not but do great good. JOHN HAY."

Hon. F. P. Sargent, U.S.Comr. of Immigration, writes:

"In response to your query, my reply is, the greatest measure of prosperity and the most harmonious relations between the employer and employee as represented in our growing industries.

"In regard to immigration, I believe that there is no subject which concerns the American people more than the admission of aliens and their distribution to those sections where there is the most need of labor. At the present time the larger per cent. of the aliens arriving and who are admitted, do not seek the open country, where there is a constant demand for reliable labor, but remain in the large cities, where the means of earning a living are few. During the present severe winter weather, the applications for relief which have been received by the charity organizations of the large cities from aliens but recently admitted, have been alarming. There is to-day in the South and other sections, a scarcity of reliable farm labor and domestic servants. If provisions can be made to divert this large immigration through these channels, rather than harmful results occurring, much benefit will be received. F. P. SARGENT.

Washington, D. C. U. S. Comr.-General of Immigration."

Governor Herrick of Ohio, writes:

"I am sure that such efforts cannot fail to result in public good, and be a potent factor in awakening interest in public questions."

Destroy the Incentive for War

Hon. Robert Baker, Congressman from the 6th District, New York, writes:

"We cry 'Peace, Peace,' but there can be no lasting peace, either in our domestic or foreign relations, until the superstructure of society is based upon justice, and not as now upon a fundamental injustice—the denial of equal rights to all.

"If we really desire peace we must strike at the cause of war at home and abroad. That cause is the desire to grasp special privileges so as to enslave one's fellows. Destroy special privileges and there would be no incentive for war. Obliterate tariffs—those artificial impediments to the world's greatest civilizer — commerce; abolish indirect taxation—the thief that robs the poor; take the tax off of personalty and off of improvements, and take the fund which society creates—land values—in taxation, and you will not only have destroyed the power which a few now have to enslave their fellows, but you will have removed the prolific cause of international strife, which is nearly always an attempt to secure possession of valuable land.

"Do this and you will have instituted here a civilization wherein justice, love, fraternity, will reign.

Washington, D. C. "ROBT. BAKER."

Hon. Ira W. Wood, Member of Congress, writes:

"I read with much pleasure the Symposium of opinions of eminent people on 'What is the most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people during President Roosevelt's Administration.' It was a bright idea and cleverly executed. Congratulations on your enterprise. IRA W. WOOD."

Washington, D. C.

Hon. C. E. Ellis, Mayor of Camden, N. J., writes:

"The results of your national Symposium must be for the good of our great country. You have concentrated ideas embracing our national welfare into such form that one who runs may read. Long live THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

Hon. G. A. Schneebel, Congressman 26th District, Pennsylvania, writes:

"I willingly give my hearty endorsement to this publication; good literature is certainly an important factor for the advancement of public good, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the efficient corps of able men and women who contribute to its pages, cannot fail along these lines."

Treat All the People Alike

Hon. Charles E. Fuller, Congressman from Illinois, writes:

"Trusts—combinations in restraint of trade and commerce—must, as such, cease to exist. The thing most to be desired by the American people during the coming four years of President Roosevelt's Administration is that the foundation of his entire character and history, 'Fair play,' equal rights for and exact justice to all, shall become the settled law of the land. As the President said in his late message to Congress, 'Above all else, we must strive to keep the highways of commerce open to all on equal terms.' When that is done, so that every shipper every manufacturer, every miner of coal, every producer, can obtain the same rates, the same privileges in every respect that a great combination, corporation or trust can obtain, then will it be impossible for any combination in restraint of trade and commerce to monopolize any industry. With absolutely free competition, monopolies can not exist. Tariff is not and never was the mother of Trusts. They exist and flourish by reason of special privileges, special rates and rebates granted by the transportation companies. Any one can mine coal as cheaply as the greatest corporation; any one can produce oil as cheaply as the oil trust; any one can buy grain and put it in his warehouse in the Northwest as well as the great warehouse companies. But you can not put it into the market at the same rate. You can not move your property when you want to; you can not compete against secret rebates and special privileges, and thus trusts and monopolies flourish, and the ordinary citizen is driven out of business. The greatest thing to be hoped for in this country during the next four years is that the transportation companies, existing only by reason of special privileges granted them by the people, shall be compelled by law to treat all the people alike, and fairly. CHAS. E. FULLER."

Washington, D. C.

Hon. Alan C. Fobes, Mayor of Syracuse, N. Y., writes:

"An interchange of views and opinions is always valuable. The Symposium printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is of unusual interest, because of the character of the men and the women whose thoughts and ideas compose it."

"In my opinion, the best thing to be hoped for is the conversion of the railways from the silent partner of the so-called trusts into real common carriers.

Davenport, Ia. "OCTAVE THANET."

GOD SEEKING US

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

OUR "Needs" are God's Providences. He must needs pass through Samaria. Here we see how the "wrath of man," the envy of the Pharisees, constraining Christ to leave Jerusalem and return to Galilee, became the occasion for his gracious visit to Samaria, and the revival that followed, for "he must needs pass through Samaria."

GOING TO THE WELL

II. Immortality of Influence on Earth. Jacob's well was there. We can be immortal not alone in heaven, but in influence on earth, also through the wells we dig, the churches and institutions we help to build, the words we write or say, the deeds we do. Centuries after we die, Christ will find refreshment in the person of his "little ones" in our orphanages.

III. The Humanity of Jesus. Give me to drink. How human this "wearied," hungry, thirsty Jesus is! He comes near to the poor in the forty miles' walk he had just taken from Jerusalem.

IV. The Divinity of Christ. If thou knewest the gift of God. It is Christ himself who is the gift of God, who "so loved that he gave his only begotten son." Christ's matchless words, even more than his miraculous deeds, prove him divine. The miracles are evidential for those who see them singly, but the threefold miracle of Christ's matchless life and matchless words and matchless influence is convincing to all open hearts to whom the Bible record comes. There they are—a life no one could invent; words no other can match; an influence that is even now transforming the world. What divinity in the very way he spake to this despised woman of the highest things. "There sat the wearied Saviour by the well-side, his eye full of a far look of love and sorrow, as if he saw the whole degraded species in the one sinner before him, and his hand half open, as if it held in it 'the living water'; the woman listening with downcast looks, and tears trickling down her cheeks; her pitcher resting on the mouth of the well; and behind her, seen in the distance, the sunny sky and glowing mountains of Palestine. But, in the noble figure and the ethereal grandeur of his countenance, you saw that the gentleness was not that of woman, nor even that of man: it was the gentleness of him whose 'dwelling is with the humble and the contrite in spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and the heart of the contrite ones.'"

"JESUS SAITH UNTO HER, I THAT SPEAK UNTO THEE, AM HE"

V. The Holy Spirit is the Water of Life. The water that I shall give him. The water Christ gives is the Holy Spirit, so symbolized all through the Bible. Water is for cleansing, for power and for thirst, and so the Holy Spirit brings to those who receive him, cleansing from sin, power for service, and the satisfaction of the soul's deepest desires. "Oh for a draught of water from my father's well!" was the cry of a dying man on the Tennessee River, when he had tasted of the impure water of that stream. That ought to be the cry of every sinful soul, now drinking of the bitter waters of sin. During a revival in a town in Ohio, a man who had been very worldly-minded was awakened, but for some time concealed his feelings even from his wife, who was a praying woman. She left him one evening in charge of his little girl of three years of age. After her departure, his anxiety of mind became so great that he walked the room in his agony. The little girl noticed his agitation, and inquired: "What ails you, pa?" He replied, "Nothing," and endeavored to quiet his feelings, but all in vain. The child looked up sympathizingly in his face, and inquired, with the artlessness and simplicity of childhood: "Pa, if you were dry, wouldn't you go and get a drink of water?" The father started as if a voice from heaven had fallen on his ear. He thought of his thirsty soul famishing for the waters of life; he thought of that living fountain opened in the Gospel; he believed, and took the water of life freely.

A mission station had been opened in one of the numerous villages of India, and a native Christian placed in charge. It was the season of intense heat, and daily the villagers sought the public well to obtain their share of the precious water, rendered doubly precious because the spring and water courses were almost everywhere dried up. The mission station had not been opened many days, when a serious calamity threatened the little band of Christians. The Brahmins refused them the use of the well.

Something had to be done if the mission were not to be abandoned, and after prayer the Christians resolved to dig a well on a piece of land which they had bought. Without any ceremony beyond their simple prayer, tools were purchased and work begun. No sooner were the first clods removed than the whole village flocked to see the sight. "What is going on here?" many asked. The Christians replied, "We are digging a well." "But you have not consulted the pundits," exclaimed the onlookers. "Nor called in the priests." "You have made no offerings to the Gods." "Nor feasted the Brahmins." "You will get no water." "But we have prayed to God and he will give it to us," answered the Christians.

As the hole grew deeper, the prayers grew more earnest and frequent. It was not now merely a question of getting water. The God of the Christians was assailed, and his faithfulness was at stake. The rock was growing harder, and as the hole became deeper, not a drop of moisture appeared. Suddenly Raghu, the native Christian who was in charge of the mission, dropping his half filled basket, rushed to the side, and began to examine carefully the bottom of a large slab of stone. "See," he exclaimed, excitedly holding up his moistened hand, "Isn't this water?" Again the pick was set to work, and the water bubbled out. How the news spread that the Christians had procured water in a well, and this had been done without the aid of priests or pundits. From all the villages around crowds came to see the "Jesus Christ's well."

It was indeed hard work opening "the Jesus Christ well" for the souls of men. He dug it in weariness, hunger and thirst; aye, with bloody sweat. And many a martyr and missionary has dug amid jeers and blows new wells in heathen lands. Let us welcome the water offered freely to us (Isa. 55), but at the cost of the blood of the Son of God, and let us be willing to open such wells for others at some cost on our own part. Thirty millions a year are dying in heathen lands, most of whom never heard of "the Jesus Christ well" of cleansing, strength, and gladness.

In Forest Hills Cemetery, Boston, there is a spring in a grove with the inscription beside it, "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again, but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst." A preacher who had once slaked his thirst at this fountain on a hot summer day, being in the cemetery a few weeks afterward, and feeling thirsty again sought it out, but it was dried up entirely by the summer heat, and the inscription came to his heart with more than wonted power as he turned back unsatisfied.

"Christ is the only Fountain from which you will never come staggering back, crying with bitter anguish, 'I thirst.'"

As torrents in summer,
Half dried in their channels,
Suddenly rise, though the Sky is still cloudless,
For rain has been falling
Far off at their fountains.

So hearts that are fainting
Grow full to o'erflowing,
And they that behold it
Marvel, and know not
That God at their fountains
Far off has been raining.

And from his love's exhaustless spring,
Joys like a river come,
To make the desert bloom and sing,
O'er which we travel home.

VI. God seeking us. The Father seeketh such. Heathen religions are all summed up in the title, "Seekers after God;" but here Jesus describes and embodies God seeking men. He calls himself not only the "door" but the "shepherd," pictured as seeking the lost. What God seeks is sincere worshipers. This does not mean flatterers or formalists. Worship is friendship, fellowship of father and child. In that sermon at Jacob's well Jesus reiterated the great message of the prophets that spirit is more than form. "What avails the altar without fire, or creed without faith, or ritual without devotion." Suppose you had been running and felt hot and thirsty, on a summer day, and you went into the house and found on the table a splendid golden pitcher; would you be very apt to sit down and say, "That pitcher is so lovely I don't care for any water now?" And if the lady said, "Yes, it is a lovely pitcher, but, my dear child, it is empty," you wouldn't stop very long to look at it, till you had first hurried off to get a drink somewhere else. If it was a tin cup at the old well, or out of the mossy bucket itself, or out of a broken glass tumbler, or from a birch-bark dipper down at the bubbling spring among the rocks in the pasture, you wouldn't much care, if you could only get cool, clear water enough to take away your thirst.

VII. Christians seeking the lost. Many of the Samaritans believed on him because of the word of the woman. One who was called because of his weak mind, "Foolish Dick," was going toward a well. An old man said to him, "So, Dick, you are going to the well?" "Yes," he replied. "Well, Dick, the woman of Samaria found Jesus at the well." "Did she?" was the answer. "Yes." The remark, riveted on Dick's mind by the Holy Spirit, quickened him into new life. He thought, "Why should I not find Jesus at the well? Oh that I could find him! Will he come to me?" He prayed, and found Christ at the well; left his waterpot to tell his neighbors what he had found; and from that time proved the reality of his conversion by his holy and active life.

An old colored servant, newly employed in the house of an infidel, was humming hymns as she went about her work. These awakened disturbing memories in her master's mind and he told her she must stop singing or lose her place. She forgot again and again and was repeatedly warned. At last she burst out:

Let those refuse to sing who never knew the Lord,
But servants of the heavenly King must speak their joys abroad.

and you'll have to get a new servant, mister." If we are true disciples "we can not but speak of the things that we have seen and heard." An old gentleman stopped at a public fountain to take a drink of water. A young lady was ahead of him, but she politely served the old man first; as he thanked her, he said, "I hope you have drunk at the Fountain of Living Water?" Her face flushed, but she did not make any reply. A year afterward, in a distant city, the old gentleman was called to visit a sick lady, who was not expected to live. She smiled on him as he came into the room, and said: "Do you remember me? You asked me once if I had drunk at the Fountain of Living Water. I thought you were rude, then, to speak in that way to a stranger; but I never could forget that question. It led me to the Living Fountain, and now I am going to Him."

The Y.M.C.A in Japan's Army

WHEN the Russo-Japanese war broke out, the secretaries of the Young Men's Christian Association of Japan undertook to do for the Japanese soldiers, what similar organizations did for the British army in South Africa, and for the American army during the Spanish war. The allied Christian bodies of Japan applied for permission to send representatives with the troops, but failed. About the middle of August, the Minister of War issued an order giving the Association permission to open up work at Antung, the Yalu River base of General Kuroki's army, and at Yingkow, the seaport of New Chwang. The Minister of Railroads granted free transportation, and the great steamship companies gave the same privileges on their boats.

HEADQUARTERS, THIRD DIVISION, JAPANESE ARMY

The Association secretaries reached Antung late in September, and Yingkow the middle of November. From the first the work has been a great success. Each post is furnished with an outfit, consisting of a tent capable of seating 200 men; books, newspapers and magazines, writing paper, envelopes, postal cards, pens and ink, graphophones, games and small musical instruments, Bibles, religious tracts and hymn books, and a thousand-and-one little things that add to the comfort of the soldiers. The military commanders at both Antung and Yingkow, placed at the disposal of the Association first-class buildings. Several of the highest commanding officers have heartily endorsed the work.

Reports of secretaries at the front give some idea of the work. They write:

Last night I spoke to about one hundred men. Many of them had never before listened to the Gospel. All were prejudiced in our favor because of what we have been able to do for them. I have never seen men who listened more eagerly.

Within a few days we have placed 1,500 copies of scripture in the hands of men who actually wanted them, and we could easily have used as many more.

During the week there were 1,500 visits to our rooms. In one day we served ten buckets of tea to the men. About 400 letters and postals a day were written in our rooms."

The National Committee of Japan is making efforts to collect money and supplies to occupy the whole field of military opera-

In Beautiful Venice

"Beautiful Venice! City of song,
What mem'ries of old to thy regions belong!
What sweet recollections cling to my heart,
As thy fast-fading shores from my vision depart!
O Poesy's home is thy light colonnades,
Where the winds gently sigh as the sweet twilight fades;
I've known many homes, but the dwelling for me
Is beautiful Venice, the Bride of the Sea."

POETS have sung and travelers have raved for ages over the beauties of this queen of cities. Painters have spent a wealth of genius in inspiration and technique in efforts to transfer its loveliness to canvas. Its palaces, churches, canals and bridges; its beautiful, dark-eyed women; its gay serenaders, with their tuneful guitars, gliding, by light of moon and stars, adown the peaceful waterways—these are themes upon which have been rung many changes in the centuries which followed since the founding of Venice in A. D. 421.

To understand why there are no streets in Venice, and why horses and carriages are unknown, one has only to remember that the city is built upon no less than eighty small islands, situated in the shallow waters of the Bay of Venice, and shut out from the deeper waters of the Adriatic Sea by a long belt of sand and earth, called the Littorale. This bar extends some two miles from shore, shutting in all the islands and lagoons from the sea. Modern engineering has erected a viaduct from the islands to the mainland, and now Venice is connected with the continent by a railway.

There are no less than 450 bridges which span the canals of Venice, connecting the islands with each other. The Grand Canal, dividing the city, is spanned by the Rialto, the most magnificent bridge in Venice. It consists of a single arch ninety feet in span, and twenty-four feet in height, built entirely of marble, and dates back to 1500.

For many centuries Venice was the capital of the first maritime and commercial state in the world, consequently there are a great number of magnificent public buildings and palatial residences. Many priceless works of art, masterpieces of Titian, Tintoretto and other great artists, are to be found in the churches.

Many of the palaces of the old-time rulers of the city—called doges or dukes—are still standing. The church of St. Mark's is unequalled among the buildings of the world, in richness of material and decoration. It was constructed from the spoils of many other buildings, and nearly every century from the fourth down to the latest, Renaissance is represented in its statuary and carvings. By degrees the walls were completely faced with magnificent marbles and porphyries and glass mosaics on gold grounds, the whole forming an effect of splendor beyond description. On Sundays and Holy days devout worshipers wend their way to church in smoothly gliding gondolas, propelled by picturesque gondoliers, just as they did in the long, long ago, and as they will do, doubtless, for generations to come, for the peculiar physical formation of the city, its canals, bridges, and architecture, forbid the modern radical changes to which many other European cities are subjected.

The Soldiers Love the Bible

The Red Letter Bible is, in my opinion, the greatest convenience and incentive to the study of the Word thus far introduced to the world. The copy received the other day is placed on the table in our reading room where a company of Uncle Sam's soldiers (sixty-five men) have constant access to it, and it is frequently consulted, not only by friends of the Book, but by men who never before had even the slightest knowledge of the Sacred Document. I hope that it will not be long until a copy of the Red Letter Bible will be found on the table of every reading circle in Christendom.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. E. W. McC., Ionia, Mich. Could you tell when and where the Rev. John Flavel lived? I have two discourses from his pen which are very old. One is "True and False Religion;" the other, "Keep thy heart with all diligence." They are most excellent sermons.

Rev. John Flavel was a celebrated Nonconformist preacher and writer of Worcestershire, England, born 1627, died 1691. He suffered much persecution on account of his religion. His writings are valued for their pungent and practical earnestness.

Old Subscriber, Riverside, Pa. 1. Is there any class on earth who can take their occupation to heaven? The masons can't; the foundation is laid. Carpenters can't; the house is built. Doctors can't; nobody is sick. Lawyers can't; the title is clear. Even the ministers can't, for there are no sinners to invite; no marriages, no funerals. 2. Is it right to pray to God to hasten the time for the betterment of the world? Our Saviour expressly says, "Now is the accepted time;" to-day, not to-morrow.

1. We know little concerning the occupations of the future life, but there will doubtless be the fullest scope for development on higher lines than here on earth and the variety will be wide enough for all. Meanwhile, our occupation here doesn't matter, so long as it is an honest and worthy one. Adam was a gardener by Divine direction, and Jesus worked as a carpenter. We have no warrant for believing that either horticultural or architectural skill will be utterly forgotten in the next world. 2. We see nothing wrong in such a prayer. The "accepted time" is a call to the unconverted, but does not refer to the whole world.

Mrs. A. W. P., Laconia, N. H. Apropos of our recent answer to Joseph K., on "the origin of toasts," sends us this interesting note:

The custom of giving toasts began about two hundred years ago. In those early times, people at banquets drank liquor from glasses in the bottoms of which were pieces of toast. Later, at similar banquets, speeches were made, elaborately praising some beautiful young lady—the young lady herself being called the "toast." Then, still later, as in our day, any person, thing or sentiment was "toasted."

Toasts in various forms seem to have been known long before the period our correspondent indicates. The ancient Saxons had their "wassail bowl," and the "stirrup cup" is also a reminder of the drinking and toasting of bygone ages. Probably the first historic toast on record is that offered by Rowena, daughter of Hengist, when Vortigern was entertained by him. Another authority says the Romans had this custom. It is satirized in Hudibras (p 2: c 1), and in Martial (1:72).

J. W. S., Danbury, Conn. Do you think the signing of cards in a revival meeting meets the command II. Cor. 6: 17? Is not the good old way of kneeling at the altar a better way?

We see nothing wrong in the employment of any legitimate means that will move men to make the decisive choice. Many evangelists have different methods of working, yet all successful. The passage mentioned has no direct bearing on the question.

Mrs. V., Culbertson, Neb. Why are ten tribes of Israel called the lost tribes? Are they not included in the Jewish race?

They were distinct from the Jews, having revolted against King Rehoboam (see I. Kings 12:19). They maintained a separate national existence for 254 years, but in 721 B. C. they were attacked by Shalmaneser the King of Assyria and carried away prisoners. He distributed them among the cities of his kingdom and sent some of his own people to occupy their land. What became of them is not positively known. As they had discarded the Mosaic law before their captivity, there was nothing to prevent intermarriage with the Assyrians, so they may have been absorbed into the Assyrian nation. They simply disappeared, and are therefore rightly called the lost tribes. Some of them may have drifted into the Jewish kingdom, but there is no record of them. Many Christians believe that the Anglo-Saxon race is descended from them, but though there are reasons for believing it possible, direct proof cannot be had.

A. D. C., Trenton, Cal. How can I prove to a doubter that Jesus had a pre-existence before coming into this world?

If your doubter believes in the New Testament, there is no difficulty. John 1: 1-18; 8: 58; Col. 1: 16; Heb. 1: 2, clearly prove the fact. If, as is probable, Scriptural proofs do not weigh with him, you cannot easily prove it. The most convincing evidence that he was more than mortal, and therefore had a pre-existence, is the existence of Christianity to-day. That a young man, belonging to the common people, an ordinary workingman, living in an obscure town of a small, uninfluential country, despised by the chiefs of his own race, and in the end dying the death of a criminal, should have initiated the Christian religion, is evidence of his being no ordinary mortal. In fact, a man who believes that Jesus was a mere man, shows more credulity than he who believes him to be divine. Disregarding the Gospel account of his words and deeds, the effect that was produced by his life, as we see it to-day, is a presumption of his divine origin.

P. A. J., Oneida, Ill., sends us some clever verses, in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is likened to a richly-laden Gospel ship. One stanza reads:

Then glide into each harbor,
And leave a portion there;
And of her precious burden
Let each one have a share.

Modesty forbids the reproduction of all the nice things our friends say of us, but we assure them they are appreciated nevertheless, and are helpful besides.

Reader, Hoboken, N. J. I am a member of the German Dutch Reformed Church, and my parents also belong to it. I do not understand German well. There is another church, the same faith and denomination, only English. The minister is a man full of God's holy spirit. Mamma is willing for me to attend this church when I feel I would like to go, but I do not like to go here and there, and have no church home. Besides, in Matt. 12: 25 I read that "a house divided against itself cannot stand." What does that mean?

We believe, if your father and mother approve, that you would be entirely right in uniting with the English-speaking church. We are the more convinced of this for the reason that you know the language well and that the preaching has already proved spiritually helpful to you. The passage in Matt. 12: 25 has no application in the case, as the Gospel of Jesus is taught in both churches and there is no essential difference in either; both are on the same side, i. e., the Lord's side, and there is no division, but rather every reason for Christian fellowship. On the other hand, Christ's words had reference to the charge made by the hostile Pharisee ecclesiastics, ascribing Christ's miracles to Satanic power. (See v. 26).

B. E. B., Sergeantsville, N. J. Why is it that a minister must serve four years and be ordained before he can perform the marriage ceremony, when a justice of the peace or a mayor can perform it without any preparation.

The one is a religious ceremony, the other civil.

L. B. K., Binghamton, N. Y. I rent a suite of rooms, and sub-rent one of the rooms. Can the landlord force me to give up the rooms, as long as I pay my rent?

The owner is presumed to control his own property, as far as deciding for what purpose it shall be used. If he rents rooms to a tenant, he can prohibit the tenant from sub-letting, by inserting a special provision to that effect in the lease or agreement. If no such prohibition is inserted, the tenant can exercise the privilege of sub-letting, and if the landlord accepts the rent under such conditions, he cannot remove the tenant until the lease expires.

J. P., Washington, D. C. Where was the Cisalpine Republic located? When did it come into existence, and when did it cease to exist?

After the battle of Lodi (May 1796) Napoleon organized two states—one, to the south of the river Po, was called the Cisalpine Republic; the other, on the north, the Transpadane. These were united a year later as the Cisalpine Republic. It included Lombardy, Mantua, Bergamo, Brescia, Cremona, Verona, Modena, and other adjacent territories — in all 16,000 square miles and 4,000,000 population — Milan being the seat of government. In 1802 it took the name of the Italian Republic, and chose Bonaparte President. In 1805, after he became Emperor, the Cisalpine Republic gave him the title, King of Italy. Thus the republic passed out of existence.

Inquirer, Leavenworth, Kan. Your inquiry is answered in an article by Z. F. Moweeny, ex-Commissioner of Immigration, in the current issue of the National Geographical Magazine. The percentages of illiteracy among immigrants he gives thus:

Only 3 per cent. of 10,077 Finns from Russia were illiterate; 4 per cent. of 40,526 Germans from the German Empire; 4 per cent. of 22,507 Germans from Austria-Hungary; 1 per cent. of 36,486 Englishmen; 1 per cent. of 11,226 Scotch; 3 per cent. of 36,7 Irish, and 1 per cent. of 59,878 Scandinavians. On the other hand, as large a proportion as 51 per cent. of 32,577 Poles from Russia could not read or write, and the same is true for Poles from Germany and Austria-Hungary; 23 per cent. of 1,544 Hebrews from Russia could not read or write, and 20,211 Hebrews from Austria-Hungary showed the same degree of illiteracy. The percentage of illiteracy among the north Italians is only 13, yet it is as high as 48 among the south Italians.

It should be remembered that a very large proportion of the present immigration is from Russia and Southern Italy.

J. S., Victoria, Miss. Please give the full definition of the word "Mussulman."

The word, according to good authorities, is Moslemin, plural of Moslem. It is derived from the Arabic word Muslim, a believer.

A. H., Ann Arbor, Mich. 1. Is seasickness ever fatal? 2. Can it be prevented by taking medicine before embarking? 3. What is a good preventative for it?

Not necessarily, although in the case of one who is physically weak, it may prove so to a person in ordinary health it is merely a temporary disability. 2. Possibly in some cases. 3. There is no absolute preventative. It is a case of nerves quite as much as stomach.

J. J. McC., Corydon, Ia. Are we to regard the temptation of Christ as narrated in Matt. 4: 1-11 as real? Was it not impossible that Christ should yield or fall?

It has been suggested that this is simply a dramatic picture of the suggestions that would arise in Christ's mind at the beginning of his public career, but the historical and personal character of the narrative forbids such an explanation. We are forced to believe that our Lord went through such an experience. He had to learn what temptation means. "He was tempted in all points as we are." That he was taken to a pinnacle of the Temple, so that he actually saw, save in imagination, all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, is unessential to the narrative. That it was a mere sham temptation seems impossible; it was a very real struggle, and to one at the outset of his career, as Jesus was, the temptation must have strongly appealed to him. We cannot conceive of his yielding, knowing what we know of his nature. But his resistance was that of a reasoning being, not that of Divinity. As an example to us, he met the temptation on human ground, by showing that there was a law against yielding to it. It is no derogation of his character to regard the temptation as real. We may say of a bank clerk, from personal knowledge of his character, that it would be impossible for him to steal, yet that would not preclude his being approached by a tempter.

E. R., Mounds, Ill. What is the difference between the ungodly and the sinner in I. Peter 4: 18?

The ungodly is a man of inoffensive life who ignores God and disregards his law, but is a man of good moral character. The sinner, in this connection, is a wicked man, living in sin and loving it. It is the difference between negative and positive defects.

MISCELLANEOUS

F. L. Johnson, 1903 Michigan Avenue, Chicago, writes to ask if some reader can send him the verses beginning:

"A skeptic stood beside the grave,
His soul denying God."

G. W. K., Motters, Md. We have no means of knowing.

Mrs. E. D. A., Alma, Mich. 1. Two-and-a-half miles. 2. Accent on first syllable.

Maud, Knox City, Mo. He is a Christian and a Protestant, but we do not know his denomination.

Mrs. Lucy T. T. F., Minneapolis, Minn. See Luke, Ch. 3, for the genealogies. Beyond this little is known.

Pleased Reader, Chittenango, N. Y. We have never heard of a so-called "Postage stamp language."

Mrs. Minnie T., Potomac, Ill. We quite agree with you. We have already received and printed practically the same statement.

Fred A. T., Phœnixville, Pa. Any indulgence that is injurious to body, brain or nerves is in the nature of a vice. In this category we must place tobacco, which, though perhaps one of the mildest, is a vice, nevertheless.

Mrs. A. W. R., Columbus, O. No; ministers do not make a charge for preaching funeral sermons or for conducting the burial service of any of their parishioners. It is customary, however, to give them something for such services, and, as far as we know, the custom is almost universal, though it is quite optional with the givers, and varies according to circumstances and financial ability.

R. McNeely, 8 Eleventh Street, Norwich, Conn., would be pleased to have some reader send him a complete copy of the old poem entitled, "Going Home," which begins:

The people they call Christians,
How many things they tell
About the land of Canaan
Where saints immortal dwell.

40,000 Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts

"Thoughts, reflections, reveries,
Observations, repartees,
Brilliant records, great events,
Tales, bon-mots and compliments;
Fancy's offspring, feelings flow,
Sympathy in joy or woe;
Sensibility's effusions,
Charades, riddles, quaint allusions,
Verse and prose, finds each its place,
And each in turn these pages grace.
Friendship's offering, ever dear,
Welcome seeks, and finds it here;
Friends sincere, discerning, kind,
These volumes oft shall bring to mind."

Forty Years' Temperance Work

FOR forty years past, from 1865 to 1905, the National Temperance Society, with headquarters in New York City, has been hard at work seeking to solve the problem of intemperance along the lines of education, missionary, and legislative effort. Over 2,500,000,000 pages of temperance literature have been sent out, some in the form of text-books for public schools, text-books for educators, preachers, lecturers, and the people training the young. Hundreds of thousands of sermons, lectures, and addresses have been delivered all over the country. There has been an extensive free distribution of literature, with exhortation from the lips of missionaries in the Southland among the colored people; libraries for colored ministers and seminaries of learning have been established, also libraries for our soldiers and sailors at post exchanges and naval stations. Literature has been sent in vast quantities to foreign missionaries in all parts of the earth, so that now, after forty years of effort, there is not a civilized country in the world where temperance literature is not sent.

There has not been a session of Congress during these past forty years in which the Society has not been urging restrictive temperance measures, furnishing data for Congressmen and Senators, and in this way it has succeeded in securing the passage of many bills in the interests of sobriety. In the State legislatures it has assisted in the passing of local option bills, and other restrictive measures. It has stood guard over the American Christian Sabbath, and has secured the defeat of every Sunday opening bill that has been presented in the several legislatures.

To meet the increasing demands upon the Society for literature for free distribution, and to carry on aggressive work and to complete an endowment of $100,000, part of which is already secured ($40,000). The Society appeals to the Christian people of America to aid in raising during its fortieth Anniversary year, the sum of $100,000. With the endowment completed, an aggressive campaign can be carried on. The Society is non-partisan and non-sectarian. It is incorporated under the laws of the State of New York.

Contributions toward the Anniversary Endowment Fund may be sent to the Rev. Hervey Wood, Field and Financial Secretary, 3 East Fourteenth Street, New York City, who will promptly acknowledge the same.

NONE SUCH ~ MINCE MEAT

"It's a long way to come for currants," said Miss Nonesuch to Mrs. Briggs, "but as the finest currants are raised in Greece we come to Greece for them—we must have the best at any cost.

"Here, as you will see, they are picked, assorted, packed and shipped to the None Such Factories—40 carloads of them a year.

"There they are picked over again to make sure that they are perfectly clean and good, pass through machines that unerringly remove stones that look so much like currants that they deceive the eye, and are then sterilized and go into the mince meat.

"When you go to our factory you will see that all the things that go into None Such Mince Meat are handled in such a way as to keep them in the right shape and form.

"You will find the currants whole—not mashed into a mess. You will find the big, plump raisins in their original form. You will find the mince meat, taken as a whole, in perfect condition, fragrant, delicious and delightful, and wherever you look you will also notice the most remarkable methods of preserving cleanliness that you ever saw in all your life."

"My, but it must take a lot of work and bother," said Mrs. Briggs.

"Yes, but a demand that calls for 1,000,000 packages a month to make mince pies, fruit cake, fruit pudding and hermit cookies for the American people shows that it pays," replied Miss Nonesuch.

getting Heat and Light at One Cost

The Giant Heater so applied will heat any ordinary room comfortably in zero weather, and without interfering with the light.

Economical, as no more gas or oil is consumed with our heater attached than without.

This heater is a scientifically constructed brass globe that accumulates, intensifies and radiates the heat from your central draught lamp or gas jet that ordinarily goes to waste giving a thorough and uniform heat.

Attracts cold air on the vacuum principle, thoroughly warming, purifying and circulating the air. No odor, no ashes, or trouble.

The Giant Heater is easily applied to any lamp chimney, gas jet, or any mantle burner (artificial or natural gas). Absolutely no danger as heater in no way interferes with the combustion.

There isn't a home in the country that does not at some time in the year need a Giant Heater and some need it all the time for the bath room, sick room, bed room, den, or office; for light cooking, heating water for shaving, warming babies' food, etc.

"I have never used or seen a heater that is of such indispensable service or so economical as the Giant Heater. It is a marvelous Godsend to the poor."

For Missionary Recuperation

OUR readers who have contributed to the erection of the Missionary Rest Home, at Chefoo, China, will be glad to see the accompanying photograph of the building as far as it is yet completed. It shows the frame of the building, with the men busy on the roofing and tiling. As at present contemplated, there will be eighteen single and double bed-rooms, and comfortable dining and sitting-rooms, storeroom, box-room, office and servants' quarters. The dining-room will be connected with the kitchen by a short covered passage. An additional story can easily be added when more funds are received. This will be an attic story, to be used when the main building is overcrowded. There is also an adjoining section of land on which an annex may be built. The committee in charge would like to proceed with these additions while the contractor has his men and materials on the ground, but they have wisely determined not to incur debt.

The China Inland Mission, always to the fore in its care for its missionaries, has already proved the value of such a provision. Its little home at Chefoo has been a blessing to the run-down worker, and the missionary directors have frequently been solicited to accommodate missionaries of other societies. There have been urgent cases which have been so received, but it has always been at the necessity of excluding the China Inland missionaries for whom the home was established. The kindness and courtesy displayed have been gratefully accepted, but it is unfair to trespass upon it too often. The building of this new home, available for missionaries of all societies will therefore remove that need.

ERECTING THE MISSIONARY REST HOME AT CHEFOO

Even when the Home is built, money will be needed for the simple furniture required. So far the funds have come in as they were needed. Dr. Hunter Corbett, the eminent Presbyterian missionary, who is serving as Chairman of the Committee, and Rev. John A. Stooke, of the China Inland Mission, who has gladly given the Committee the benefit of his experience, are men of strong faith. They believe, that with need so pressing, with so many self-denying men and women waiting in pain and weariness for the relief such a Home can afford, the God whom they serve will not allow the project to lag for lack of funds. At the initiation of the movement, and at every subsequent stage, the matter has been laid before God in prayer. Every payment has been met through his loving care, and to his hands are committed the future needs, with confidence that he will provide for them as they arise. His children have the privilege of serving him by contributing to a cause so helpful to his servants.

THE ENLARGING KINGDOM*

SLOWLY, yet surely, is the Kingdom of God advancing in the world! The prophet saw the stream issuing from the threshold, and when the man with the measuring line had measured a thousand cubits, the stream had increased from the ankles to the knees. It was not until he had measured four thousand cubits that the stream had become a river that could not be passed over. To the impatience of man, the nineteen centuries that have passed since Christ came, seem to have been a long and weary time, but steadily we are approaching the grand consummation, when the kingdom becomes a mighty river. Let us not lose heart or listen to the pessimistic moans of those who are losing faith, but take new courage from the progress already made.

The past century is one that should surely encourage us. Looking back to its beginning, we cannot but admit an immense advance. The Church has displayed new vigor, and has sent out in every direction the heralds of the Cross. In a hundred years heathendom has heard the good news, and the foundations have been laid for a mighty advance. The principles of Christianity have taken hold of the policies of the nations and they are being almost unconsciously transformed. Not only have men as individuals been saved, but Christian ideas are spreading among the nations. War is coming to be regarded as a horror, to be avoided by every means. Slavery is being gradually crushed out. Even the antagonism of capital and labor is yielding to the principle of arbitration. The great word of Christ, "Ye are brethren," is permeating men's hearts. Selfishness is coming to be regarded as a disgrace to any man or people.

Parallel with this advance is a closer study of God's Word. The criticism which has done so much harm, and has alarmed so many Christians has done its worst, and now we are realizing its benefits. We understand the Bible better than our fathers did. In its new aspect, the attacks of its opponents fall harmless against its essential truths. We understand the character of Christ better than any former generation has grasped it; we see more clearly what he came to accomplish, and how it may be effected. The denominations are no longer enemies, but are working together under the common banner. The prospects are brighter than they have been in any previous period, and in spite of discouragements, there is reason to believe that we are nearer than ever before to the time when it shall be said: "The Lord reigneth."

HELPING THE EX-PRISONERS

ALTHOUGH the Prison-Gate Mission of New York, has only been organized a short time, much good work is being done by it every day. In New York and vicinity 20,000 prisoners are released every year, either to prey upon humanity or to be rehabilitated by such an organization as the Prison-Gate Mission. After they leave prison, many of these men try to find employment, but few, if any, will receive them. The result is that more than fifty per cent. of all first offenders return to prison a second time, simply because nobody is willing to extend a hand of help, or to encourage them to honest lives.

Chaplain Munro, Superintendent of the Mission, stands at the prison door, while the ex-prisoners pass out into liberty. He speaks to them words of encouragement, pointing them to Jesus, the Saviour of sinners. Many of these men have sad tales to tell. Their only hope is in God. The aim of the Mission is to reform them and help them to begin a new life.

One day lately thirty men passed through the prison doors to liberty. Chaplain Munro spoke personally to twenty-eight of them. The great question these men ask is, "Can I get something to do? Will any one employ me?" When they come to the Prison-Gate Mission office, they are asked, "Are you through with crime and resolved to try to live honestly?" Unless they are willing to answer that question in the affirmative, little can be done for them.

"We try to get men on their feet again to live honest lives by the help of God," said the Chaplain. "We are limited in our work by lack of money. We could do ten times more, had we the means.

"I know of a young man who served a year in prison for wrong-doing. When he came out, he had the best intentions to do the right thing. He started to find employment. Wherever he went, the door was slammed in his face. Nobody wanted him. At night, tired, hungry and weary, without a place to sleep; in his desperation he committed another crime and was soon back to prison again. The Prison-Gate Mission is just for this class. It endeavors to commit them to God in a new life, and to find employment for them. Of course this is a most difficult task.

"A few days ago I called at the home of a young married couple. The man only recently came out of prison, and the Mission has been endeavoring to get him on his feet again. He told me sincerely that he was through with crime; he believed God had forgiven him for the past, and as long as he lived he intended to do the right thing and be an example to others. He now has employment in a factory at a small salary, and a Christian man has promised to direct his future life."

Encouraging letters are sent to the Mission Treasurer, Mr. A. A. Knowles, by persons all over the land, who feel deeply for the ex-prisoner. One letter is from a lady in a neighboring State. She writes:

DEAR SIR: Enclosed find five dollars for the Prison-Gate Mission, which seems to me a most worthy and necessary charity. Our sympathies are with the Mission and its workers. W. H.

Another letter to Treasurer Knowles with $12.00, reads as follows:

I saw your name in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as Treasurer of the Prison-Gate Mission. Enclosed find $12, to be used for the same, with best wishes. I. A. B.

Another sympathizer writes:

Being very much interested in your work for ex-convicts, I enclose a dollar for the cause, only wishing I had more to give.

A friend in St. Louis writes:

Enclosed find a small sum for your Prison-Gate Mission. I realize the importance of your work and hasten to send my mite. A man committed suicide not long since, because after his release nobody would help him. E. L.

A lady in Colorado writes:

In reading over my paper, I came across the story of the Prison-Gate Mission, of which I most heartily approve. It is time something was done for those who leave our prisons and are friendless. I send my mite to show my approval and wish it were ten times more. MRS. L. M. H.

Here is a note from an aged lady in Cleveland, Ohio:

Enclosed find Post-Office Order for Three Dollars to aid you in your work. This is the gift of an aged Christian whose hand trembles badly. MRS. L. W. H.

The Treasurer, Mr. A. A. Knowles, 33 Wall Street, New York, will gladly acknowledge all contributions in aid of the Mission's work. Inquiries concerning the work will be promptly answered by the Superintendent, 192 Elm Street, New York City.

Obligations to Christian Endeavor*

WHILE the source of all spiritual growth is the Holy Spirit, there are, as experience proves, human means, which largely contribute to it. Every Christian, looking back over his life, can remember a sermon, a book, or a religious convention which brought him to a higher plane of spiritual experience, or gave him clearer views of his duty. It is given to every man to help or hinder his brother in his individual life. No man liveth to himself. In considering on this Christian Endeavor day the benefits that have come from membership in the Society, this must not be overlooked. The world is continually pressing on the soul with its tendencies to make the man sordid and worldly. We need help to resist it. The difficulties and temptations that assail the individual members may differ, but the aspirations are alike and every one may help another. Mere contact with men whose object in life is the same as our own strengthens our hopes and resolutions and encourages us to hold fast the hope that is in us.

There are many, too, who on this day, must acknowledge how much help they have received from a definite pledge. The mind needs to be toned by definite resolutions. There is no doubt that in many a home, the practice of morning and evening prayers would have fallen into desuetude but for the definite pledge given at the Christian Endeavor Society. It is in the nature of an engagement which must be honorably fulfilled. We are the creatures of habit, and a society that leads to the formation of good habits is one to which we owe much. Light, too, on the study of Scripture has often come from the discussion of various passages, and for this, also, we ought to make acknowledgment. The Society has, in this and other ways, helped to promote the development of spiritual life, and on this day, an avowal of the fact may be made.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for Feb. 5. "What I owe to Christian Endeavor." Ezek. 47: 1-12; Ps. 36: 8.

Answered Prayers

A. C. M., Kansas. "I have received so much comfort from the 'Answered Prayer' column. I wish to tell others how often when things worked very dark and every door seemed closed, God has answered my prayers and removed the trouble. We can trust our Father in heaven absolutely. His promises never fail."

C. H. V., New York. "I desire publicly to acknowledge God's loving goodness in answer to prayer. Goodness and mercy, prosperity and happiness has followed me all the days of my life, when I have followed his injunctions."

Mrs. T. A. C., California. "It is a great comfort and pleasure to read your 'Answered Prayer' column, and I wish to add my testimony to it. For the Lord has so definitely answered many of my prayers, even a breath of prayer, I have so much to thank him for."

J. R. A., California. "I desire to acknowledge the goodness and mercy of my Heavenly Father in granting answers to my prayers many times, when I have been to him for deliverance, and I render unceasing thanks."

V. C., California. "The Lord has surely heard and answered my earnest supplication in behalf of my husband. Bless his holy name."

Mrs. S. B. E., Oklahoma. "God has very graciously heard and answered my prayer, and I am earnestly praying for a dear one to be brought to Christ, and ask THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family to pray for him. We have the promise if we ask in faith, in his name, we shall receive."

B. E. E., Texas. "I trusted in my Redeemer, though my sorrow was the greatest. I prayed without ceasing. My Heavenly Father heard me. I believe in a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. I want to tell it to the sorrowing hearts of the world."

E. M. C., Davenport, Ia. "My heart is full of love and thankfulness for all God has done for me. I know that God does answer prayer, if we go to him fully believing and trusting that he will do all that is right and best for us."

S. M. McK., Connecticut. "Many times through a long life the Lord has answered my prayer in time of deep trouble. I do praise my Heavenly Father, and will trust him for all that is to come."

Deaf People Now Hear Whisper

Listening Machines Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but A Like Eye-Glasses.

Ever see a pair of Listening Machines?

They make the Deaf hear distinctly.

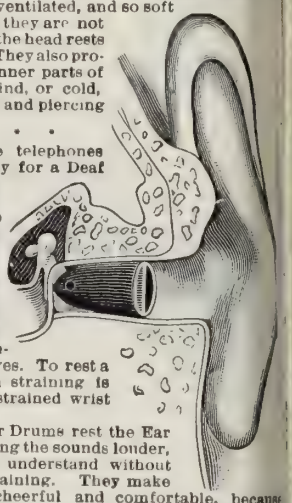
They are so soft in the ears one can't tell th are wearing them.

And, no one else can tell either, because th are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sigl

Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just glasses are sight-magnifiers.

They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. Th can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minut just as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and o

And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, b cause they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.



These little telephones make it as easy for a Deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing grows, because they rest up, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.

Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people can talk with their friends without the friends having to shout back at them. They can hear without straining. It is the straining that puts such a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person.

* * * *

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound strike hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of spreading it weakly all over the surface. It thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struck the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ear drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves. When we make the drum vibrate ten times as much we make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.

This is why people who had not in years heard a clock strike can now hear that same clock tick anywhere in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ear Drums.

Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noises in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and cured (even after Ear Doctors have given up the cases), by the use of these comfortable little ear-resters and sound-magnifiers.

A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.

Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks who were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book. They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.

Some of these very people may live near you, and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.

This book has been the means of making 326,000 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it today. Don't put off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.

Christ on Worship

By MRS. M. BAXTER

EVERY footstep of the Lord Jesus was full of purpose. Having laid down his own will, he always did those things which pleased the Father (John 8: 2[illegible], and thus he was in Sychar by the will of God. There is no chance in any life thus guided, and there can be no mistake, while the communications are kept open on both sides; the heaven side and the earth side.

Jesus was weary: but a man who is utterly surrendered to the will of God, does not count his weariness when God distinctly calls him to any service. It is wrong not to rest when human effort or pressure from others would drive us to work on exhausted strength; but it is another thing when the call is from God to do a thing, and to do it now. He always makes himself responsible for the strength and power to do his will, in his time, and in his way. When a woman of Samaria came to draw water, he heard in the secret of his heart, his Father's direction as to what the coming of this woman at this time meant for him: he said to her, "Give me to drink." Little knowing who she was face to face with, the woman betrayed an uneasy conscience in the asperity of her answer, "How is it that Thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?"

It was a challenge not accepted: a bitter word meant to provoke, which, however, did not provoke. His heart's love went out to this unattractive, bitter-spirited, sinful woman, and he said: "If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, 'give me to drink,' thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water." The tables were turned. Instead of being offended at her rude reply, he speaks of giving her something. Her attention was attracted, and she began to speak with courtesy, "Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep: from whence then hast thou that living water?"

The Lord would not be drawn into anything personal. That which filled his heart as this woman's need, of which she was unconscious, and he would not be drawn to side issues. Jesus answered and said unto her: "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life."

The woman saith unto him, "Sir, give me this water that I thirst not, neither come hither to draw." She had committed herself, she had taken the place of the needy, the thirsty, and it gave the Lord Jesus his opportunity. She was a sinner, deeply dyed with sin, a sinner whose character was publicly known in Sychar, and before she could drink of the living water, the sin must come to light. "Go, call thy husband, and come hither." A more inconvenient demand could not have been made to her. "I have no husband," was the answer. And he who is the Searcher of all hearts replied: "Thou hast well said, I have no husband; for thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband; in that saidst thou truly." And the woman stood exposed as the sinner she truly was before those holy eyes which had penetrated into her past and present. What would she do? She felt this was no guess of an inquisitive stranger; she felt the Presence in which she stood. "Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet."

It was a full admission. She was darkness, but she had come to close quarters with him who is the Light of the world, and he saw her as she was. Until this coming to close quarters about our sins takes place, no question of living water for us. Unless we see ourselves as God sees us, there is no possibility in us to value or to desire his salvation. She falls back on what religious knowledge she has, which consists in the distinction between the Samaritan and the Jewish form and place of worship; a miserable rag to cover a life of sin! And yet, such is the resort of the generality of mankind; a form of worship which may suit the taste of man, without any inquiry as to whether it pleases him to whom it is supposed to be offered! Jesus does not complain of the worship, either in Samaria or at Jerusalem, but he speaks of something higher, of that worship which suits him to whom it is offered.

Questions and Answers

Jessie R., Cleveland, O. Is it true, as I have seen it somewhere stated, that last winter was the very coldest ever recorded? How does it compare with foreign records?

It was probably the coldest known to the present generation of Americans. There are, however, many much colder countries. In one severe winter it is said wine was sold in Antwerp frozen in blocks. Moscow has a record of 48 degs. below zero, while Yakoutsk, in Siberia, has experienced 73 degs. below zero on January 25, 1846. Canadian observers say that frost is diminishing there with increase of population.

Subscriber, Atlanta, Ga. Does not the statement that Christ gave his life as a ransom for all, imply that all will eventually be saved?

It would be a very happy thing to believe, if there were reason for it. We read of some who make his work of no avail through their unbelief. His sacrifice was sufficient for all, and that is the meaning of the statement you quote. If, in any country, there was a rebellion, and the king announced that all persons, who, before a certain day, laid down their arms and submitted to his authority, would be pardoned, the promise would apply to all; but only those who fulfilled the conditions would be entitled to the pardon. Christ promises that all who believe on him and forsake their sins will be saved. Those who cleave to their sin, and thus practically reject him, cannot claim his promise of salvation, though they might have been saved if they would. His ransom is not limited, but its acceptance is, by the men to whom it is offered.

B. B., Syracuse, N. Y. What does "Belial" mean? Is it the name of a person?

It means wickedness, worthlessness, useless. Hence "son of Belial" means literally a "son of worthlessness"—in the vernacular, a hopeless no-good.

D. G. B., Cincinnati, O. Is not the practice of women preaching in churches contrary to Paul's prohibition (I. Cor. 14 : 34 40)?

The prohibition was given under circumstances very different from those now existing. In Corinth, at that time, only depraved women would take a prominent part in a public meeting. The women of the Corinthian Church believed themselves to be emancipated from the customs of the time by the teaching of Christianity, and were inclined to make the most of their liberty. It aroused a prejudice against the new religion which did harm. The apostle, therefore, following his usual custom, counselled concession to popular opinion. There was also a scandal in the Church, which would give the impression that morals were low. All this is changed now, and we do not believe that Paul would prohibit women preaching in these days. Acting on the principles he laid down in other matters, we think he would welcome their aid.

J. H. B., Mechanicsburg, Pa. Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North and South Carolina and Virginia observe January 19 as a holiday. Will you kindly advise what it is observed for?

January 19 is General Lee's birthday.

T. W. C., Great Barrington, Mass., writes:

In a recent issue, you stated that, "The Electoral College is an outgrowth of our political system and is a political necessity." In the Convention of 1787, that framed the Constitution of the United States, the construction of the Executive Department of the Government was attended with great diversity of opinion. Whether the Executive should consist of one or of three persons; whether the election should be by the people, or by the National Legislature was thoroughly discussed, and at one time determined by the Convention that a single Executive should be elected by the National Legislature for the term of seven years, and that he should be ineligible to a second term. (A proposition that the Executive should be chosen by electors, chosen directly by the people, met at first with no favor in the Convention.) This was the decision by the Convention when, on July 24, 1787, the matter was referred to a "Committee of Detail." This Committee reported August 6 following, and revived the suggestion, which was finally adopted by the Convention, that the Executive should be chosen for four years, by electors chosen by the people: each State to have a number of electors equal to the whole number of its Senators and Representatives in Congress; and in case no candidate had a majority of electoral votes, the choice of an Executive was to be made by the House of Representatives, and the choice of Vice-President by the Senate.

J. S. A., Imperial, Pa. 1. Will the Jews be restored to their own land as a nation. 2. What passages of the Bible predict the restoration? 3. Are there any signs of their return?

1. Yes, the promise is given them distinctly. 2. The prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Joel, Zechariah, are full of references to the return. Isaiah 66; Jeremiah 23 and 33; Joel 3; Zechariah 14, are a few among many others which you will easily find by reading those books. The fact that the promise is given that they shall never be disturbed again indicates that the prophecy is still future. 3. Zionism is the most hopeful sign. It proposes to lease the land from Turkey, paying as rental a larger sum than the Sultan now derives from it, which would naturally tempt a monarch so poor as he.

D. R. H., Dalton, Ga. 1. To what denomination did Dr. William Hannah belong? 2. Is his life of Christ a safe and reliable work? 3. Where can I get McClintock & Strong's Encyclopedia?

1. As he was the son-in-law of Dr. Chalmers, we suppose he must have belonged to the Scottish Free Church. 2. We do not remember any statements in it that are not drawn from the Gospels. He could not have had any other authority. He was an able and orthodox teacher, so his book is doubtless safe and reliable. We have not a copy at hand, but when we read it many years ago, we saw nothing in it that was unsound. 3. Harper & Brothers, New York.

E. T. K., North Dakota. Would a person who was baptized as an infant be justified in being immersed, in order to become a member of the Disciples' Church, there being no other at hand? Is not the first ceremony sufficient?

Every church has the right to stipulate what ceremony is necessary to make a person eligible for membership. Why should you object? You may very properly regard the immersion as a ratification of the ceremony performed when you were an infant. It is a mode adopted by that church of confessing Christ before men, and if, as you intimate, you regard it as unnecessary, you may still conform to a practice that your fellow-Christians deem essential.

Reader, Philadelphia, Pa. Is there hope of a suicide's salvation?

A person who commits suicide while in unsound mind is not responsible for what he does, and the question of his salvation would depend on his state before he lost control of himself. There are others, who, while sane, may be so overwhelmed by a sudden calamity, as to be temporarily irresponsible. Of these, too, we may have hope, if they were, while in their ordinary senses, believers in Christ and living Christian lives. LOEN LAKE, NORWAY, SCENE OF A GREAT TIDAL-WAVE DISASTER

In a cable dispatch from Christiania, Norway, dated January 17, it was related that fifty-nine persons had perished during an avalanche at Naesdal, north of Bergen, on the previous Sunday. A mass of rock was suddenly precipitated into Loen Lake from the neighboring hills, causing an immense wave twenty feet high, which swept the neighboring shores. Houses, people and cattle were swept away. Only four bodies were recovered. A great storm stopped the relief work, as the surrounding district was unable to send help.

Pastor Wagner at Home

A VISIT TO THE AUTHOR OF "THE SIMPLE LIFE" IN THE HEART OF HIS PARISIAN PARISH

TO get to the modest hall in which the Rev. Charles Wagner speaks weekly to his little congregation, one must first pass through the heart of the busiest manufacturing district of Paris. Very far away, indeed, are the bright boulevards and their well-fed, well-dressed crowds; the inhabitants of the Bastille quarter know little of the Paris of pleasure and frivolity, and they have the serious air that, says the pastor, really corresponds to the character of the majority of the French people.

An abrupt turn from the main street into a narrow, winding alleyway, brings you to an old-fashioned building, with a court in front of it, littered with empty wooden boxes and carpenters' tools. On one side, is a modest plumbing establishment, on the other, a primitive kind of furniture factory, and a general air of industry hangs about the place, which is, however, none too clean. There is still no sign of a church, a mission hall, or anything suggesting the ecclesiastical.

"Where does one find Monsieur Wagner?" you ask one of the blue-bloused workmen, hammering away in the court.

He looks puzzled a moment. Then:

"Ah, you mean le pasteur—le bon pasteur; up two floors to the left!"

Now up a broad, turning stairway, and you find yourself before a door with the latch outside; this looks as if you were intended to enter without knocking. You do so, and you see at once that you have arrived at your destination.

The Mission consists of two rooms, one (to which the door admits), about twenty feet square, the walls lined with books, and, in the centre, a huge, hospitable-looking table covered with packages, books, pamphlets and little piles of opened and unopened envelopes; the second being the hall proper, a barren-looking room, with about three hundred chairs arranged in parallel lines across the floor, and with a raised and rather spacious alcove to one side, where the children's Sunday School meets. At the further end, is a simple pulpit, and, to one side, a stove. This is all; there is literally nothing else in the room; no picture on the wall, and no carpet or other covering to the floor.

"If we began to beautify our little hall, we should spend money which would do more good used otherwise." says Pastor Wagner simply, and this seems to dispose of the matter.

PASTOR WAGNER IN HIS STUDY

A HOLIDAY GATHERING OF CHILDREN IN THE WAGNER MISSION CHAPEL, PARIS

Pastor Wagner's days are busy ones, for he not only preaches there nearly every Sunday, but he is the animating influence of the several other lines of work connected with his little institution. First of all comes the children's Sunday School each Sabbath, at nine o'clock. Then the morning service at a quarter after ten. Every Wednesday night meets a young people's society, which listens to readings, holds discussions, and is twice a year entertained by a musical or dramatic endeavor of some of its members. Then on Monday evenings meets "The Garland," a club composed of young women, who sew or read, or otherwise amuse themselves, talking all the while of the incidents of their daily lives, and of their struggle with the world; for, it must be remembered, that M. Wagner's flock is composed of the poor and the poor alone. He has many times refused to add such features to his work as would attract the rich, or any other class than that which lives about the neighborhood of the Mission.

"We have not room enough for them," he says. "They might be the cause of keeping the others—the ones we want—away; and that would be the worst thing that could happen to us."

The only way that "outsiders" can be connected with the work, is through supporting it by contributions; the enjoyment and the profit of the pastor's work is for his humble parishioners, and his talks are directed towards helping them live their kind of life contentedly and towards teaching them what are the things really worth while in life—the spiritual substance, that they may seize and hold and benefit by, as well as the richest man or woman who ever lived.

Twenty-two years ago M. Wagner was unknown, and his work in Paris had not yet begun. To-day he is an illustrious man and his name is known wherever there are thoughtful people. But to his flock, he is the same that he has always been. He is open to them at any and all times. In his talks, he speaks to them as a friend might speak to another, by no means failing to point out their faults, but with appreciation for their difficulties and common-sense suggestions as to meeting them.

It is doubtful if many of his congregation know of the interest he has recently created in the United States. "The pastor's visit to America," modestly says the annual report for 1904, "has brought some attention upon us, and it is just possible that this may result in our getting our new building a little more quickly than would have been the case otherwise." This is the only reference to the matter to be found at the Mission, and it is in accord with the evident desire of the pastor. Certain conditions have come about which have brought fame to him and attracted widespread attention to his congregation; but if the latter were fully aware of all this, Pastor Wagner feels it would make a subtle and undesirable change in his people. The simplicity of his relations with them might vanish forever. It is for this reason that, although he has told them about things seen and heard in the United States, he has said nothing about himself, nor about the prominent people who have shown him their sympathy and approval. He speaks of America to them as a country where mission work and Protestantism have worked out a great role for themselves, and he explains how this was done. That is all; nobody would be more surprised than they to learn that his influence is greatly felt elsewhere than in the crowded quarter which he has chosen for his effort.

M. Wagner speaks but rarely outside this mission hall. He has often been asked to do so, but again he feels he must reserve the best of himself for his people. Speaking and lecturing and preaching elsewhere would

The Royal Robes

TEXT—Psalm 45: 8: "All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces"

THE marriage bells are chiming. The glorious robes of a kingly bridegroom and of his bride, the daughter of a queen, and the garments of her many bridesmaids are rustling. Royal jewels are flashing. The most skilful of musicians are playing. And as the "Wedding March" sounds forth, the marriage procession is approaching the king's throne-room over boulevards of gold. The numberless inhabitants of the Metropolis of the Universe, with its walls of jasper and its gates of pearl, and its palaces of spotless ivory, are making the welkin ring with hallelujahs of never-ending joy. The banqueting house is prepared with the wedding supper for the coming guests. For the Divine Bridegroom of my text is bringing his queenly bride to her place at his side, over which hangs the banner that his hands have placed there, the banner of love. Never on earth nor in heaven has been seen, and never shall be witnessed, a wedding procession like unto this. Gorgeousness infinite. Wealth and power unlimited. Splendor and magnificence passing all understanding will there be manifested on every hand.

Royal Weddings

Earth has beheld some wonderful wedding pageants. When the present Emperor William of Germany was married to the beautiful Princess Augusta Victoria, the representatives of all the civilized governments of the earth were there. Among Berlin's guests at that time were the King and Queen of Saxony, the Grand Duke Alexis of Russia, Crown Prince Rudolph of Austria, the Crown Prince of Sweden, the present King of England, the late Duke Aosta of Italy, and scores of other notables. The young bridegroom came from Potsdam, at the head of his gigantic "Foot Guards," to meet his bride. On the day of the ceremony, the homes and the stores and the public buildings were decorated. When the nuptial vows were taken, the cheers of the people who crowded the streets about the royal palaces, echoed the thirty-six salvos of artillery, which thundered the news to the world that Prince William and Princess Augusta Victoria were one.

When Napoleon III., in 1853, rode to the Cathedral of Notre Dame to be united in marriage with Eugenie, the most beautiful woman in Europe, the progress was one continuous ovation. Seated in the wonderful glass coach that had been built for the coronation of his illustrious uncle, the Emperor passed through long lines of his enthusiastic subjects, who rent the air with their vives. When the young Queen of England became the bride of Prince Albert, in the Royal Chapel of St. James, nothing that the money, the wealth, and the love of a nation could do to make the wedding ceremony impressive and joyous, was left undone.

Memorable in the annals of the world are such spectacles, in which all that human ingenuity could conceive has been done to render the nuptials of the rulers of nations scenes of overwhelming magnificence. But the culmination has yet to come—not here, but in that glorious realm in which the Lord of Hosts has set his throne. The marriage of the Lamb will be the grandest and most glorious of all unions, when Christ takes to himself his Church which he has redeemed with his precious blood, "a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, holy and without blemish."

Perfumed Robes

Human imagination fails to conceive of a spectacle so glorious. Let us, instead of dwelling on the marvelous scene, take but one detail of its beauty—the wonderful garments with which the Divine Bridegroom is to be robed on that glorious occasion. The Psalmist mentions them in the words of my text. They are wedding-robes, that have the aroma of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia. Let us try to describe them and to learn a few practical Gospel lessons from them.

The royal robes of the Divine Bridegroom will be the most expensive of all garments. Costly was the wedding apparel of Louis XIV., which he wore when he was married to Maria Theresa of Spain; of Prince Ferdinand, when he stood by the side of his bride, Isabella of Castile; of the Dauphin of France who, as Prince Francis, married the beautiful Mary, Queen of Scots; of Emperor Nicholas II. who, in 1894, gave his heart and hand in marriage to the beautiful Princess Alix of Hesse; of Napoleon Bonaparte when, in 1810, he wedded Marie Louise, in the place of the dethroned and exiled Josephine. But the robes of the Heavenly Bridegroom will surpass all these in their value. How do we know? The Oriental imagery of the text signifies it. Fine and beautiful in texture they are to be perfumed with myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces.

Famous Costumes

By the adornments of a robe you can form some estimate of its value. Let me take you into the Berlin palace, where are guarded the royal jewels of Prussia. I lift before your eyes the beautiful diamonds and pearls which the Hohenzollern queens have worn for generations. Then, I say to you, "When the eldest daughter of Queen Victoria married the Crown Prince Frederick, she wore these gems," what would you answer? "Ah," you would reply, "her wedding dress must have been made of very expensive material to have been appropriate for such adornments as those." Suppose I should tell you that when the noted German archæologist, Dr. Schliemann, made his explorations under ancient Troy, he found there the costliest of feminine and masculine adornments. There were waistbands of gold, earrings of gold, bracelets of gold, headbands of gold, tiaras of precious stones, finger rings of gold. "Ah," you say, "if the ancient inhabitants of Troy had such rich waistbands as these, truly the ancient dresses and robes must have been of the most expensive materials." No wonder then that Agrippina, wife of Emperor Claudius, had a robe made entirely of gold. No wonder then, Darius, King of the Persians, had a golden mantle with jeweled clasps, and with two great golden war-hawks woven into the texture. No wonder that among the royal wardrobes of Herod the great, was found a garment made entirely of silver threads, and that Pliny the younger, wrote of a Roman lady who had a dress made up entirely of precious pearls. If the adornments of the apparel of the ancients were so expensive, we can understand why Solon, and Pythagoras, and Cato, and Fannius, and Didius by "sumptuary laws," tried to restrict extravagance in dress.

Christ's Costly Robes

Now, what gold and silver and precious stones in dress mean to the Western mind, myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, in a sense, mean to the Oriental mind. As I would say to you, "Her dress was sparkling with jewels," the Oriental, to depict sumptuousness and expensiveness of apparel, would say, "His garments were aromatic with myrrh, and aloes, and cassia." Myrrh was one of the treasures of the East. When the Wise Men came to bow at the Manger, what expensive presents did they bring? Gold and frankincense and myrrh. These Oriental sages would not have offered to a king a present of myrrh, unless it had been of great value. Doctor Kitto tells us this, "Myrrh was offered in presents, as natural products were in those days, because such as were procured from distant countries were very rare. In the same way, we often hear of a rare animal, or bird, being presented to royalty in the present day." "The aloes of Cochin-China," wrote Dr. Faussett, "are worth their weight in gold." The value of cassia, also, was enormous. It was used, as Dr. McClintock informs us, as an ingredient in the costliest unguents. When the Psalmist tells us that Christ's wedding garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, we know that he means us to understand how precious they will be.

Let us consider what makes them precious. They are the glory of our Lord. He will wear them in joy and gratitude for the sacrifices his people have made in his cause. They are going to cost all the moneys we give to our churches and to our reformatory institutions. We must give this money for Christ's robes. He bids us give. They are going to cost all the moneys we send to foreign missions. "Go teach all men" is the Bible command. Not only have they cost money, but blood. They are going to cost all the blood of the martyrs which has been shed in the past. Ah, now the expense of those wedding-robes is rolling up. If the dead body of a common laborer, slain by an express train in New York State, is worth $5,000, how much must have been worth the martyred blood of a Paul, a Peter, a Stephen, a Polycarp, a Justin Martyr, a S vonarola, a Ridley, an Elphege, a Gileyn de Muler, John Rogers, a Lawrence Sanders, a John Harper, Brebœuf, a Lallermand, and of the thousands and t tens of thousands of men and women slain by sword a spear and battle-axe, or burned at the stake, and t tured with untold agonies in many "chambers of ho rors?" God alone can know how the value of Christ wedding-garments is increasing.

But the supreme element in the cost of those weddin garments is the blood of Christ himself. It was by his ow suffering and death that he won the right to wear then Do you wonder that Isaiah, when, in prophetic visio he sees these wedding-robes, describes them by the color—the color of the bloody sacrifice. "Who is this, cried he, "that cometh from Edom with dyed garment from Bozrah? This that is glorious in his apparel Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy gar ments like him that treadeth in the wine vat?" Ah, m friends, I am glad to-day we can talk about the roya crimson, and not the royal purple of Christ's wedding garments. I am glad that even in heaven, when look ing upon the divine face of Jesus, we shall not be al lowed for one moment to forget the enormous cost i money and blood of the marriage-robes in which Chris will be clad as the Bridegroom when he takes th Church as his bride in eternal nuptials. Am I goin beyond my right in declaring that Christ's wedding robes are to be the most expensive of garments?

Garments that Cure

But, drawing near to the Divine Bridegroom, I find that Christ's wedding-robes have a wonderful curative quality. Their touch is like the cool hand upon the fevered brow. Oh, yes, they are more than that. Their touch gives spiritual and physical healing. It is like the healing power of Christ's earthly robe, when the border of it was pressed just an instant by the forefinger of the poor woman who had an issue of blood for twelve years. No sooner did her flesh come in contact with its folds than immediately "the woman was made whole from that hour." We have read how the ancient devotees used to travel many miles to be cured of their physical pains at the tomb of Saint Ann de Beautre, or at the "healing spring" of Lourdes, or by the flowing robes of Saint Anthony, Saint Patrick, or Saint Bernard; but never did tomb, or fabled water, or flowing garments of dead saints have such curative qualities, spiritual or physical, as will have the wedding-garments of Jesus Christ.

How do I know this? The symbols of the myrrh, and the aloes, and the cassia teach it. They were all used medicinally. "The myrrh, as is well known," writes an authority, "was celebrated for its use in medicines. The ancients prepared a wine of myrrh and also an oil of myrrh. It is found as an ingredient in many of the celebrated compound medicines." "Myrrh is especially of great use," says another author, "along with aloetic medicines and compounds of iron." The medicinal quality of aloes is defined in every dictionary, and cassia was also used as a drug by the ancients. Thus, when we come in touch with Christ's wedding-garments, we know that they are going to heal all of our diseases and assuage all our pains, and be the balm which

Will Take Away Every Heart-ache

In Goethe's Faust, we are taught by the poet that the royal robes of God shall appeal to us mostly by sight and not by touch. But I would change the wording of the master-poet of Germany, as I describe the healing qualities of Christ's wedding garments, as follows:

> Here at the roaring loom of time I ply,
> And weave for God the garment thou feels't him by.

Pain, sickness, suffering, pain of the head, pain in the heart, all to disappear before the touch of Christ's wedding-robes. Oh, think of the blessed rapture of such a wedding ceremony with the Divine Bridegroom! I remember, some years ago, I was called to officiate at the saddest wedding of my life. A young woman was dying. Even then the summons of death was pounding at her bedroom door. But before she left earth, she wanted as a bride to clasp the hand of the lover by her side. We silently entered the sick-room. The breathing as heavy and low, but the eye of the sufferer was bright and happy. A strong young man stood by the side of the sick-bed. The nuptial vows were spoken. The young bridegroom could give to the bride his love, but he could not give to her health. The words, "Till death do you part," never had such solemnity for me as at that service. Even then, death was saying to the couple being wed, "You must part. You must part at once. I am Death and I am coming to court your bride." But at the heavenly marriage of the Divine Bridegroom there shall be no pain on any face, no heartache in any breast, no hacking cough, no tearful eye. The garments that smell of the myrrh, and the aloes, and the cassia are curative robes. They are wedding garments, scented with myrrh, a medicine, and with aloes, a medicine, and with cassia, a medicine.

But have the royal robes of Christ no higher purpose than the mere prevention of pain, or of heartaches? If that be all the efficacy of these wedding-garments of the Divine Bridegroom, then I say, let me have my pain and heartaches. There is sometimes a joy in suffering. There is sometimes a peace in pain. As Tennyson writes: "'Tis better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all." That wedding-ring upon your hand — would you wish never to have had it placed there? It may be many years ago since the hand that put it upon your finger was laid in the grave. Would you like to blot out all the memories you have had with that earthly life? "Oh, no," you answer. "No, no! My joy today is in living in the beautiful halls of memory, and in thinking over again all the happy days we spent together. I would sooner have had a dear husband as he was, and have had him taken away, then never to have known what the companionship of such a husband meant to a wife." If you have an incurable physical pain, would you have the physician give to you an opiate to deaden your sensibilities and your mind for years to come? "Oh, no," you answer, "then I would be nothing more than a hibernating creature, or a log or a stone. Better my thinking mind with pain, than continual unconsciousness without pain." Well, then, the wedding-robes of Christ, must do more for us than merely alleviate suffering, else we would want none of them. I would not wish to live a thousand years on earth, if, to do it, I would have to endure the mere animal existence of an Australian aborigine, even though then I might not know physical or mental suffering.

Thus I come to the climax of my subject. The Royal Robes of Christ, give to us a positive assurance that the marriage ceremony of the Divine Bridegroom and of the Church, his bride, is to be a beginning of never-ending joy, not the mere end of sorrow or pain or suffering, or death.

No, Christ's robes will never become yellow, as are some of of the bridal dresses that were worn many years ago. They will never be put aside as useless. The wedding songs that we shall sing at the marriage of the Lamb shall never have an end. The rapturous joy with which we greet our dear ones on the other side of the Jordan shall never grow monotonous. The loving kiss which the Divine Bridegroom places upon the lips of his bride shall never become cold and indifferent. The myrrh, and the aloes, and cassia, shall preserve and increase joy, even as the wedding-garment of Christ shall halt and cure and kill sorrows. Oh yes, these wedding-robes of Christ are to be aromatic robes, symbolical of never-ending peace. The ever-increasing joy of earth shall roll and swell and continue to increase through all the coming ages. "Hosanna, Blessed is the king of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord. Hosanna!"

From whence come these airs, laden with odor of the myrrh, and the aloes, and the cassia of Christ's wedding-garments? They come from the "Ivory Palaces of Heaven." Mark you well my answer. Not from one Ivory Palace, but from many. That means that when we, as part of the Church, are to be united to Christ, we are going to keep our own individualities. Had my text said, "In the Ivory Temple of Heaven," I might have had my doubts about it; but there is no doubt here. Just as you and I, perhaps, have been married in our own homes, surrounded by our fathers and mothers, and brothers and sisters, and dear friends, so in that "Ivory Palace of Heaven" we are going to have a "Home Wedding." Yes, they are all going to be there to meet us, just as they were when here. That little curly-headed daughter, who slipped out of your embrace long years ago, will be there just as she was when here. That dear old mother, who lived for you and died for you, she will be there. Not in a "Celestial Temple," but in a "Celestial Home" the Ivory Palaces! Do you not see how near and familiar are the "Old Homesteads of Heaven," glistening under the celestial sun?

But though there may be many "Ivory Palaces" in heaven, odorous with the myrrh, and the aloes, and the cassia, I fear that some of us, who are invited to be at the wedding ceremony, may not be present. It is one thing to get an invitation to the marriage ceremony; it is another to be there. Shall we at this moment say to our divine Bridegroom, "Jesus, thou Prince, we will not love thee; we will not unite with thee? We shall not live with thee in an ivory palace of heaven, since we have not lived with thee on earth?" Shall it be that all our dear ones, who have gone beyond, who are waiting to listen to our nuptial vows with Christ in the Ivory Palace of Heaven, shall have to wait for us in vain?

Supposing you refuse to meet the divine Bridegroom at the marriage altar of heaven, what will Jesus do? What will your loved ones, your wife and mother and father and little child, who have gone beyond—what will they all do? Supposing, when you were about to be married, your fiancee had refused to appear. What would you have done? "Oh," you say, "that was impossible. She loved me too much not to have met me there." Can it be, oh, would-be-bride of Christ, that you love Jesus any less than your loved one loved you?

Lead on, Saviour! Lead on! Even now we may hear the wedding chimes ringing for the nuptials in the Ivory Palaces of Heaven.

How long, oh, heavenly Bridegroom,
How long dost thou delay?
And yet how few are grieving,
That thou dost absent stay.
Thy very bride her portion
And calling hath forgot,
And seeks for ease and pleasure,
Where thou, her Lord, art not.

Awake, ye slumbering virgins,
Send forth the solemn cry,
Let all the saints repeat it
The Bridegroom draweth nigh.
Let all our lamps be burning,
Our loins well girded be;
Each eager heart expecting,
With joy thy face to see.

multiply his interests too much, and tend to separate him from the little congregation in whose lives he means so much. Occasionally, one sees a new book by him—for the two or three that are known in America and England do not represent more than a tenth of what he has written—and once in a while an interview with him appears in a French paper. But rarely, for he does not encourage even that kind of publicity for himself.

"You do not need me," he says, "and they do. There are others who are ready to inform and help you; if I do not do it for them, on the other hand, who will?"

Pastor Wagner chooses practical texts for his sermons. He does not select one embodying a general idea, but one that goes direct to the understanding of the simple people to whom it is addressed. Then he discusses it, explains what it means, and how it may be applied, in such plain, unadorned, business-like fashion, that it can never dawn on his hearers that the text exists for any other reason than to be used for making life better and brighter, and perhaps a little easier. For M. Wagner tells them that life is not for work alone, but to be enjoyed; the great thing to learn is how to enjoy your work and how to help others to enjoy theirs.

The little world about each of the members of Pastor Wagner's congregation must be a bright, clean and cheerful one. They seem to have a feeling that the Mission is theirs; they have a pride in it and do not feel merely as if they were part of some huge ecclesiastical organization, so great as to be ponderous, and so general as to be useless. In such a church the working people of Paris would be lost; it would mean nothing to them. But the little hall on the Rue des Arquebusiers is for them a second home. They have made it, and it has remade them.

When I arrived at the hall the other day, it was half full of a busy swarm of women tying candles on a tall Christmas tree, which stood at one end of the room, decorating the branches with ribbons, and attaching bags of candy and presents to the topmost limbs. The place was brimming with laughter and good nature, and all was hurry, so that when the little ones arrived they would find things ready for them. Every few minutes a knock was heard at the door of the outer room, and in a moment would enter a workingman or woman with an armful of presents, or at least some further supply of colored ribbon. Finally the chairs were all covered with modest gifts, and fruit, and multi-colored baubles for the tree. It was so different from the ordinary scene in a mission at Christmas time! Here no shining equipages stopped at the door and no fur-clad, high-born ladies stepped from them, to be followed by maids loaded down with costly presents. The gifts came from the members themselves, and many sacrifices had been made to buy them; but a happier, more glowing set of Christmas merrymakers was surely never seen than those poorly-clad mothers, getting ready for their childrens' coming.

In came the sturdy pastor himself followed by two sturdy daughters and his little son. He was immediately assailed on all sides with questions as to "What should be done with this?" and, "Who was to get that?" and, "Wouldn't he come and look at this object?" and, "What did he think would be best to do in such and such a case?" With his genial face lighted up with appreciation and honest human enjoyment of the festive activity about him, the pastor answered quickly each question in turn, and then sat down at the table to read his letters. There was a long, thick envelope with "White House" printed on the upper left-hand corner, and this he did not open, but put at once into his inner pocket.

"I could not help noticing that envelope," I hazarded. "May I ask if you and President Roosevelt often write to each other?"

"No, not often," he replied. "He has been good enough to write once or twice, recently, to tell me of some new effect of my books in your country, but these letters have been marked 'private,' and I cannot tell of their contents. I shall never forget what President Roosevelt has done for me, and my feeling when I learned that he read my books to his family around his own fireside. It is splendid to be of use—of use—of use! It is the best one can do in the world, and it is that that explains the success of our work here.

"We expect to leave this hall soon—as soon as we have enough money to build another place. I have selected a piece of ground in this same neighborhood, but ground is very dear in this part of Paris, and we have not yet enough money. We have forty thousand dollars—money we have raised by our own efforts, and that will go a long way towards what we want. In another year we shall have a larger hall, and own it; but I do not want it too large. We must not run the risk of growing out of ourselves, so to speak. The mutual profit in our case depends on our keeping close to one another, and that cannot be done if we become too many. But we do need more room, especially for our Sunday School and the sermons on Sunday mornings, and this we shall have."

The pastor said he had received no money at all from American friends. Not that he expected it, but he thought proper to deny the statements made to the effect of Mr. Wanamaker's having subscribed fifty thousand dollars to his enterprise.

"I should never refuse money for our cause," he said, "that would be wrong. But I believe that, as in the past, so in the future, we shall have to depend on our own efforts. That is the way things are done, and we shall succeed all the better for it."

Our conversation could not be prolonged, for a group of happy children poured in through the door, and in another moment the pastor, the keynote of whose character is cheerfulness and the love of children, found himself the centre of a merry picture, being dragged towards the spot where the big tree stood laden with its marvels for the little people of the Mission.

Preaching to an African Kin

Heli Chatelain writes of the Progress of his Work at Lincoln Station

IN a letter dated at Lincoln Station, Hanha, via Benguella, West Africa, Mr. Heli Chatelain, the Swiss missionary and explorer, writes to General John Eaton, Washington, D. C., as follows:

It is now seven years since I sailed from New York. All the party I brought from America, and the reinforcements that followed, left me one by one, and when the last was gone, I began to breathe and to build, and now the Lincoln Station is fairly established.

When the Phil-African League turned the work over to me and ceased to support it (excepting personal gifts from Dr. Chamberlain), my valiant sister and my Swiss friends came to the rescue so effectually, that three lay members were sent out and maintained, and the interest there is growing spontaneously. The work is passing safely out of the pioneering stage. I have borne, and keep on bearing, testimony against the giant evils of the slave trade and rum traffic. Being the only witness in this section against these profitable curses, you may imagine that I am not very popular, for all — black, yellow and white of every present nationality — are interested in, though not generally addicted to these nefarious occupations.

Though some natives were better Christians, I think, than some church members in civilized lands, I have not yet baptized any, and shall not hurry to do so. I have been witnessing, teaching and sowing the seed. The enclosed photograph shows an average audience in the villages. The man in the middle with a white handkerchief around his head is Kavalu, the new king of the Kalukembi tribe, to which I minister. To his left is his Muene-Sapi (the Lord of the Key), his right-hand man. To his right, his second wife holds the baby. The remainder of the little characteristic group are part of his family and kindred. The place is in front of his house or hut, in a sort of rocky chamber, on the top of a mountain of wonderful Titanic rocks, a real eagle's nest, whose only entrance and exit is by the narrow passage slightly visible between the two rocks at the right, near where the black Zaccheus is perched. The sower of the Word is—need I say it?—your servant.

HELI CHATELAIN PREACHING TO AN AFRICAN KING AND HIS HOUSEHOLD

Last year, Kavalu lost many members of his family and tribe and much cattle, by savage raiders from the South, some from the borders of German Southwest Africa. We could hear the shooting, and were in danger ourselves. As the local authorities had never interfered with those annual raids, I wrote a letter to the governor in Benguella and to Lisbon, and some was done at last. Posts were established, and a tary expedition is now trying to occupy the land bc ing on German Southwest Africa; but it seems t foolishly managed, and some deserters have alread turned to this section. A "Jesus Doctrine" Dispensary in Korea

I SEND you a description of an afternoon at Taiku Dispensary, Taiku, Korea, which will interest your readers. During the morning, Mr. Su, our evangelistic helper, sits in the waiting-room with a pile of Testaments and tracts in front of him. He sells these and explains them to all who come, and, as patients from the country, generally early, and having nowhere else to stay in town, they remain in the Dispensary waiting-room, and form a good audience. Each patient invariably brings one or two friends with him, often three or four, to lend him their sympathy and support, should it be necessary.

After dinner, a service is held in the waiting-room. The doctor, Mr. Su, the helper, and the two students, sit together cross-legged on the floor, and ask all to come in for a little while.

SOME NATIVE PATIENTS

The doctor, announcing that this is a "Jesus Doctrine" Dispensary, and the custom here to read the Bible and pray before seeing the sick, requests all to be quiet and attentive during the service. A passage of Scripture is then read and explained, and a short Gospel talk given. Mr. Su also often speaks. In conclusion, all are invited to bow in prayer. It is surprising how uniformly they accept the invitation and prostrate themselves upon their faces, although many have never before bowed to anything except their ancestral tablets and the graves of their parents.

Most Koreans have an idea of a great God, the Maker and Ruler of all, although they do not worship Him. There is a well-known saying among them that when a man is in dire distress or peril, he will forget all his spirits and call upon God the Creator.

After service, all are urged to purchase books, and the doctor and students return across the narrow yard to the combined consulting, drug, and operating room. The patients are then seen in the order of their arrival. The first who presents himself is a boy of fourteen, called "Tori" (a storm), a common name among Korean boys. "Tori" has begun to attend Sunday School since he came to the Dispensary, and every Sunday morning gathers with the other boys to sing and read

A young man of twenty-four now enters and says, "Peace be with you!"

THE NEW HOSPITAL AND DISPENSARY AT TAIKU, KOREA

He explains his ailment, and is quickly attended to and relieved. He is told his lame shoulder will be well in three weeks, which he can hardly believe. After him comes a man apparently in great pain, carrying his arm in a sling. Showing his finger, he says: "A man hit me there." This is a common result of quarreling in the East. "Well, my man, you'll have to have the chim (knife)." "Do you think I can endure it?" "You will have t We are not prepared to give you sleeping medicine. Th wound will not wait another day. You may lose your fi ger." "All right;" and he grits his teeth and does n cry out though he nearly faints. Koreans of the lowe and laboring class bear pain well, better than American but the "gentlemen" class are great cowards. "No go and take this sheet of paper with you," we say to him "When you get home read it carefully. It explains th Jesus Doctrine. Come every day after dinner."

To every patient who does not buy a book a leafle tract is given.

An old acquaintance now appears—young Kim—a boy whose father beat him terribly last year to make hin stop gambling. "Father presents his respects to you an begs you to accept this unworthy gift," he says, advancing and laying upon the table a hundred eggs, tied in strings with rice straws. "How is your father?" "He is well and is studying the doctrine every day." "And you, I hear that you have become a Christian too." "Yes, I, too, have become a believer," he says modestly, upon which he is heartily congratulated.

"Ah! Kim Chusa! it is a long time since we have met." "That is very true," replies a tall, slender silk-robed man with the jade button of an official. "Have you and yours been at peace in the meanwhile? And that tremendous work of house building, is your anxiety concerning it over?" "Yes, a thousand thanks for remembering our poor affairs. We are quite at peace." "But what brings your honorable presence to our miserable Dispensary?" "Being in town on business, how was it possible for me not to look in upon my friend?" "Thanks!"

Kim Chusa lives in the country, twenty miles out. He has attended church services, but is more interested in foreign articles and hearing of foreign lands than in the Gospel. To-day he stays while the next few patients are seen, and recommends them with earnestness to follow the doctor's directions implicitly.

Life in a "Neighborhood House"

OVER in South Brooklyn, some twenty years ago, an Italian colony began to form along the East River front. Immigrants of this nationality naturally gravitated to the locality from various ...es, principally because a line of steamers docked ...re, which gave cheap rates to the seekers after a ...me in America. Besides, there was work to be had in ...e vicinity along the docks, and in various factories. F... a number of years the neighborhood was not distinctively Italian, but since the tide of immigration has ...swept with such strength toward our shores, th... quarter has become one of the largest It...ian cities in the world.

...President and Union Streets, from the river up... are its principal boulevards, and by day an... night they are crowded with dark-eyed, ol...e-skinned sons and daughters of Sunny Italy, all gorgeous in their dress of foreign fa...ion and color, for the residents of Brooklyn's "Little Italy" are not all poverty-stricken by any means, although there are many po... families among them.

A visit to the recently established "Neighb...hood House," in Sackett Street, brought o... many interesting facts about this city by th... river front. This Settlement was organized for sociological and medical work, and was p...jected and planned by some of Brooklyn's wa...thy and influential citizens. Mr. Ellis Ard heads an executive committee of four, th... other members being Miss Elizabeth Dutcher, Miss Katherine Dreier, and Miss Zoe Liebman. Miss Dutcher ha... been connected for some time with the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities. Mr. Frederic G. Pauli is the ...asurer of the new Association; there is also a board of directors, thirty-six in number.

"The work of the Association," Mr. Lord explained, "is much needed. This neighborhood is chiefly Italian, and the residents constitute a foreign population. We intend to Americanize them and make good citizens of them. We shall attempt to better their condition in every way, laying particular stress upon educational efforts. The Association is non-sectarian." Miss Louise Barthalow, head-worker at the "Neighborhood House," is enthusiastic over the outlook. "We aim," she said, "not only to teach the children, and give the young people a place where they may spend a profitable and pleasant evening, but we are encouraging the old folks, the mothers and fathers, yes, even the grandmothers and grandfathers, to come to our social evenings.

"Some of these older people cannot speak a word of English, and a few have never been outside of their homes since they landed in this country; but they are so interested now that our house is crowded every Friday evening, when we have a social gathering. Mothers come with their babies and their young daughters, whom parents would not ordinarily allow to be out alone on the street at night. The young men come with their sweethearts, and the evening is spent delightfully in music, recitations, etc. The Italian love of color finds expression in their picturesque costumes, and their voices are very sweet, as they join in the songs."

One unaccustomed to people of this nationality would be surprised at the familiarity of many of them with airs from the grand operas, which they sing with true Italian fire and enthusiasm. Here they meet, exiles from Rome, Genoa and Naples, each with a patriotic and clannish pride in that particular part of his native land in which he was born.

All seem to be united in the desire to become good Americans, or at least that their children, many of whom were born here, shall have all the advantages which birth in a free land brings. And so they hail with unfeigned delight the "Neighborhood House," and its many educational and social advantages.

IN THE INDUSTRIAL DEPARTMENT

It did not take long to interest the colony, when the children carried home the wonderful story of what was going on in the old brick house in Sackett Street. Groups of children would surround Miss Barthalow, when the house was in process of renovation, and beg that their names be put down on the list for membership in classes or clubs. In her genial way, Miss Barthalow relates how, when she first came to the house, she started to go over to the grocer's, and on the way she met three little Italian boys. She stopped them, and asked them to come to the house and help her organize a class and a club for boys. Their little faces lighted with pleasure, and one said, "We go-a now." "Not just yet," she replied. "Come at half-past three," and leaving the youngsters, she entered the grocery.

"I had been there only a minute," said she, "when a scuffling of many feet attracted my attention. Looking up, I saw a horde of half-clad Italian boys grinning at me, and saying, 'Me too, teacher—me-a go.' The grocer woman, thinking they were planning to raid her store, seized a broom, and began to shout, 'Police!' I tried to calm her, but she continued to shout, brandishing her broom, so I left hurriedly, with the mob of boys at my heels. We have had a large attendance and full classes ever since."

It is said that there is hardly a village or field in Italy where the famous Italian quarter of South Brooklyn is not known, and consequently it will not be long before the fame of "The Little Italy Neighborhood House" will cross the ocean. A kindergarten is to be opened soon, and classes in music, art, clay-modeling, basketry and cooking are already established. There are children's clubs for boys and girls, the motive of these being to take the children from the streets, which is their only playground. There are also young men's and young women's clubs, special classes in English literature, a library and dispensary, the latter to be equipped with associated physicians and surgeons.

Miss Elizabeth Hatfield is resident nurse, and already has her hands full with many neighborhood calls. She tells an amusing story of being called to the bedside of the mother of eight children. The woman was critically ill, and as Miss Hatfield stood over the patient, the nurse felt something peck at her foot, looking down she was surprised to see a large rooster walk out from under the bed. The nurse asked the man what he meant by keeping a fowl there. He answered that he was keeping it for his wife's first meal, "when she got able to eat." So impressed was Miss Hatfield with this peculiar kind of thoughtfulness, that she said nothing when she found that there was a whole flock of pigeons in the only other room, where the eight children slept.

To show the children that it is not charity which they are accepting, they are charged a penny each to attend the classes (though none are turned away who do not have the penny), and club dues are five and ten cents a month.

"Of course," said the head-worker, "all the income from this source combined would not pay for the gaslight; but it makes the boys and girls have a feeling of independence."

The house is an old, yellow brick, three story and basement building, which has been put in thorough repair. Thirteen layers of wall paper were taken off from some of the rooms, and five and six layers of oilcloth, straw-matting and carpet from some of the floors. The building had been used for a lodging-house for Italian workmen, and was in a deplorable condition. New plumbing, furnaces, etc., have been put in, while paint and papering have done wonders for the rooms, at whose windows dainty curtains hang. There is a piano in the class and assembly room downstairs, while the living rooms of the four residents on the upper floors are furnished cosily, and have a most home-like air. Classes are held every day from half-past 3 until 5:30 P.M., except Fridays, and from 7 to 10 nightly. A weekly reception and entertainment is given on Friday nights, at which parents and all members of families are welcome.

ITALIAN MOTHERS AND CHILDREN AT THE SETTLEMENT

CALLED HIGHER

DIED Dec. 17, 1904, Mr. J. R. Morris, at his home in Baldwin, Miss. Mr. Morris was an uprihgt and respected man, and a faithful, consistent member of the Methodist Church.

Edmund Reed was born in Washington County, near Salem, Ind., on March 31, 1827, and died Aug. 25, 1904, aged seventy-seven years, four months and twenty-five days.

Miss Leah Kratz went home to be with God on April 25 last. She was nearly eighty years old, a true and devoted Christian woman, and a dear lover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Passed away at his home in Cheyenne, N. D., Mr. Dennis Nunn. He was one of the earliest pioneers in this country, and always lived a most exemplary and Christian life. Mr. Nunn was nearly ninety years of age at the time of his death.

Passed away at her home in Radnor, Mrs. Hannah Lewis, on March 8, 1904. She was born in Wales in 1827. Mrs. Lewis was a devoted follower of the Lord, and served him faithfully. She was an interested reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for more than twenty years.

James E. Anderson, one of the pioneer residents of Bellevue, Ohio, recently passed away at his home on Wood Street. Mr. Anderson leaves a wife, son, and daughter, and many loving friends to mourn his loss. He was the son of the late Alvin Anderson, and was born at Canadice, N. Y., Aug. 13, 1836.

Mr. Alexander Gwin, of Altoona, Pa., died Oct. 27, 1904, in his eighty second year. At the time of Mr. Gwin's passing away, the family circle numbering twenty-five, had never before been broken by death. Mr. and Mrs. Gwin were to have celebrated their golden wedding in a short time, and a poem composed for that joyous occasion, was read at the funeral.

On Sept. 23, 1904, Mrs. Elizabeth W. Young was called home. Mrs. Young was in her seventy second year, and died very suddenly from heart trouble. Her husband, the Rev. Edward C. Young, and four children, are left to mourn their loss. The weekly visit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was a great pleasure to Mrs. Young, she having read it regularly for many years.

19 PASTORS IN A REVIVAL

THE churches of Schenectady, N. Y., have been aroused to activity in a most natural and acceptable way. In December, the Ministerial Association of the city appointed a committee, consisting of the Rev. Messrs. Talmage Adams and Cooper, of the Reformed, Methodist and Baptist Churches, to plan for the week of prayer. The result of their planning was union afternoon services addressed by one man. The Rev. George R. Lunn of the First Reformed Church was selected, and spoke each afternoon. These meetings grew in interest from day to day with larger audiences, until the ministers felt that it was an indication of [illegible] for aggressive evangelism. Several churches were carrying on their own evening work, noticeably the State Street Methodist Church, of which the Rev. Fred Winslow Adams is pastor, and where Miss Bertha Sanford, of the Lucy Webb Hayes Training School of Washington, D. C., was conducting meetings. All of these individual efforts are now laid aside, and nineteen churches, representing seven denominations, have united in aggressive work. On Sunday, January 8, the nineteen pastors exchanged pulpits, [illegible] no man preaching at home and [illegible] denominational lines they carried one message of the Church, improving this opportunity to reach the unchurched. In the afternoon a mass meeting of men was held in the Opera House, when Mr. Lunn and Miss Sanford spoke with good effect.

On Monday the meetings began in earnest. At the Y. M. C. A. at noon a meeting [illegible] was led by business men [illegible] to come and go as [illegible] was a different leader each day. THE HEART OF THE WORLD

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF OPENING CHAPTERS

Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., of the aristocratic St. Cecilia Metropolitan Church, is a pastor with broad humanitarian views of life. He has found time amid the duties of his ministry to write a book, entitled, The Christian Socialist, which has just been published under the nom de plume of "Mark Burns." It excites a tremendous sensation. His secret of the authorship is known only to Miss Mildred Rodney, his betrothed, who has divined it. The book excites mingled praise and antagonism, and is the topic of the hour. The conservative element denounce it as dangerous to society. Judge Rodney is especially bitter. Next winter, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton is chosen as bishop. A distinguished audience assembles in St. Cecilia's, to witness the consecration. At the critical moment, the pastor makes an open avowal of the authorship of the offending book. Bishops, clerics, and audience are stricken dumb with amazement. His ecclesiastical career is regarded as ended. Miss Rodney, notwithstanding some parental opposition, consents to marry Stanton, and the two begin to face the world together bravely.

Meanwhile, a great strike is going on at Lenox, and Stanton is invited to address the Union men, by Bruce Harvey, their president. He advocates Christian love and forbearance, instead of violence, but the meeting is stampeded by the news of a riot at the mills. Stanton and Harvey go there with the crowd, but cannot preserve order. In the riot several are killed and many injured. Stanton rescues a poor negro worker from the furious mob, but is himself badly hurt in doing so. He and Harvey become fast friends. Harwood, and Wrightam are two millionaire mill-owners, whose hard and oppressive measures have embittered the workers. Stanton resolves to plead with them for a better understanding, as both are church members and professing Christians. He calls on Wrightam, but meets with a decided rebuff. With Harwood he has more success, and the two become good friends. Harwood has a great domestic sorrow, which takes the sweetness out of all his business triumphs. He leaves his wealthy home and friends, and disguised, goes to work as a mill-hand.

Stanton meanwhile is becoming well known as an advocate of Christian Socialism, and is a frequent lecturer. He meets many queer characters among the workers, and much appreciation. The troubles at Lenox continue, and he arrives there one day just in time to find a mob about to burn a negro who is accused of murder. Stanton determines to thwart the lynchers, but is knocked senseless, and the negro is burned. Next day the real culprits are found, and the negro victim is shown to have been wholly innocent. There is a popular revulsion of feeling in favor of Stanton. On the following Sunday he preaches in one of the leading pulpits, by invitation, and takes the lynching for his topic. Some people in the audience take exception to certain remarks by the speaker, as unpatriotic, and there is a momentary interruption, during which many leave the hall. Stanton then quietly concludes his discourse. While visiting the Company's mill, Stanton witnesses a heroic act by a worker, who saves Harvey's life by imperiling his own. He recognizes the worker as Harwood. Harwood dies of his injuries, and Harvey, an hour later, learns the true story of his heroic rescue. Harvey, on recovering, seeks Stanton's society and counsel, and is apparently deeply interested in religion. His interest, however, is wholly superficial. He soon resents Stanton's influence with the workers, and demands that Stanton's evangelistic labors among them should cease. On Stanton's refusal to comply, Harvey, in a passion, strikes his friend. The latter accepts the assault in silence, forbearing to retaliate.

MEN and women all over the church that day hid their faces, not daring to look up, moved and angered, and stirred to conviction. No one of the pastors of Saint Cecilia since its founding, had ever preached that message to it. Stanton in his closing prayer, wrestled with God for results. Would the Spirit touch these men and women as he had those down on the Rink? Would they permit him to? Or would the pride and social selfishness of years drive away forever from these souls the most blessed experience a human being had ever had? Was the old fact always to be taken occount of, "How hardly shall they that trust in riches enter into the Kingdom of God?" Was it always going to be thus true that not many wise, not many great, not many noble are called? Must Christianity always work from the bottom up? Yet what hope to reach any solution for the Labor problem where only one side was in an attitude to act in a brotherly fashion? If the men of muscle and the men of money did not both and all together act to help one another, what could be done? There were rights on both sides. There were wrongs on both sides. Capital was selfish. Labor was selfish. Capital had too much of the products of Labor. Labor was now realizing its opportunity, waking up from its giant's sleep of the centuries, and, careless of its great strength, was beginning to throttle industry. If Capital had usurped power that never belonged to it, no less Labor, through its trade-unions, was arrogantly assuming tyrannical functions. Each side needed to be converted. No earthly power could do this. Hatred, prejudice, selfishness do not yield to man-made schemes to bring in a social millennium. Right here God is needed. No one else will answer. Will these souls in Saint Cecilia, used to luxury, priding themselves on their fashion, will they take up the rough and heavy cross of sacrifice? They will have to change the habits of years to do it.

The congregation went away from that morning service as if from a deep sensation. It came back again in the evening, and crowded Saint Cecilia floor and galleries as it had not been crowded for years. Members of Saint Cecilia who had not been to the evening service for years were present that night. Stanton preached on the love of God for all his children, emphasizing the need of repentance and restitution as going hand in hand with forgiveness. When the service closed people went out very slowly. He had made no call for decisions, it had not seemed best for him to do so. But as he went home, after earnest greetings from some of his former parishioners, he was accompanied part way by a member of Saint Cecilia who had always been in close sympathy with him.

"This has been a great day for Saint Cecilia, Dr. Stanton."

"Yes, I hope it is. My prayer has been for real results."

"Wrightam was out to both services. Did you see him?"

"Yes, who knows——"

"It would be a miracle."

"But no more than the miracle of Johnny Parr's conversion last week."

"Yes, greater. Wrightam has more to repent of. His genuine conversion would have infinite results on the Labor question in Lenox. Do you think it is possible?"

"All things are possible with God," answered Stanton gravely.

He parted from the friend, and when he reached home began to discuss the outcome with Mildred of Wrightam's possible conversion to a genuine Christian life.

They had been talking only a few minutes, when a knock at the door called Stanton out into the hall, and on opening the door he was astonished to see Harvey standing on the porch.

"I don't want to come in," Harvey said.

"Why, wife and I are alone. Come in, Harvey," Stanton said in such a matter-of-fact tone that Harvey, after hesitating a moment, came in.

His face was sombre, as usual; but there was a struggling look of shame that spoke eloquently of the inward feeling.

Mildred greeted him kindly, and invited him to lay aside his overcoat and hat and draw up to the open fire.

Without a word he complied and the three sat down.

"Of course you understand, Dr. Stanton, I don't expect to be forgiven and all that rot. Even if you did it, which I don't ask, I could not forgive myself, so that would leave me right where I am now. But I am willing to do something to make myself feel a little more comfortable." He said it with a grim self-accusation that impressed Stanton painfully.

"It is not necessary, Brother Harvey. I have no feeling of resentment towards you and you need not——"

"I knew what you would say of course, What's the use? But I wanted to let you know I was willing to do something, so I wrote out an account of the incident for the Lenox Times. I didn't want you to think it had been worked up by someone else." To Stanton's astonishment, Harvey handed over the article, and added, "Read it out loud. I want Mrs. Stanton to hear it."

Stanton was fearful at first that Harvey had been drinking again. But looking at him carefully, noting the dark face, the deep-set eyes, the grim rigidity of the whole figure, he was soon convinced that Harvey was sober.

" 'Last Thursday night at the Rink, at the close of the meeting, Bruce Harvey, the President of the trade-union had a disgraceful altercation with Dr. Stanton. Harvey had been drinking, and charged Dr. Stanton with an attempt to destroy his, Harvey's influence over the mill men through the revival services now being held in Lenox. Dr. Stanton tried to reason with Harvey, but he refused to listen, and finally struck the minister twice in the face. Dr. Stanton did not return the blow. The affair was not witnessed by anyone except the two men. It was a cowardly assault, and deserves the honest contempt of every man woman and child in Lenox."

"Is that all right? Is it strong enough? I signed my name to it, you see." Harvey spoke the words with a dogged harshness of manner that disturbed Stanton more than the most abject appeal for mercy could have done.

"Yes, it's strong enough," Stanton finally said, "but it lacks warmth," and with the words he suddenly threw the manuscript on the coals of the open fire.

"It is not necessary, Harvey. Do you think I will permit a thing like that? You do not know me. Does not God forgive us a thousand times worse things than this? Shall we men treat each other less mercifully?"

Harvey's face worked strangely. Mildred added her word to that of her husband.

"Mr. Harvey, you and Mr. Stanton must be friends again. You cannot afford to quarrel. Together you can do so much for the cause. Why not take Mr. Stanton at his word and resume the old relations as if nothing had ever happened. I never knew a man who had such a poor memory for injuries as my husband. You should see some of the letters of abuse he gets and hear his answers to them. His replies are always so friendly that I have often wished I might be present when the letters are received by the people who poured out pages of abuse. How silly they must feel to sit there expecting to get blown up and instead of that it is a bouquet thrown at them. It is fun to do that. There is nothing Mr. Stanton or I would appreciate more than a good forgetting on your part, and you need not fear for ours."

Harvey listened with head cast down, visibly affected. At last he blurted out, "But while this may be all right for you, where do I suffer? God might forgive a man, but what if the man cannot forgive himself? Curse the drink! It makes me a fool every time I touch it."

"Leave it alone then," Stanton said, sternly. "But all that's past, Harvey. Bury it. We expect to. Think of Harwood. In Christ's name Brother Harvey, I beseech of you let God into your soul. Get the blessing you need. Don't despise the Spirit."

Harvey was agitated.

"I can't ever be a Christian. My whole life habits are contrary to the idea. Don't try to convert me. I'll—I'll count it an undeserved honor if you two will permit me to call you friends, but as for the other——"

Stanton eyed him sadly, and without many words allowed him to go on giving his version of the events that had led up to his assault on Stanton. When he was through he rose to go, but when Stanton held out his hand Harvey held back.

"Try me for a while," he said doggedly.

"Mr. Harvey," said Mildred spiritedly, "you do not treat us fairly. Give us credit for honesty at least. We are not willing to wait."

"All right," Harvey answered as if relieved. He shook hands with them both, and went away leaving behind an impression that, while he was willing to reopen the friendship of the past, he was hardening his heart against the Holy Spirit and trying to fortify his mind with every known excuse for not yielding to his gentle but firm summons to put Jesus Christ on the throne of his life as Lord.

He had been gone only a few minutes, and Stanton was beginning to lock up below preparatory to going upstairs, when the bell rang again.

Stanton opened the door, and was confronted by the oldest son of J. B. Wrightam, a young man about twenty years of age. He had evidently been running, for he spoke with difficulty.

"Father wants to know if you can come over and see him."

"Yes, certainly. When?"

"Now, right off, Dr. Stanton."

"Is your father ill?" asked Stanton, as he hurriedly put on his coat.

"I don't know," replied young Wrightam.

Stanton was surprised at his answer, but said nothing. He stepped into the sitting-room and told Mildred where he was going. At once she said, "Is it possible Mr. Wrightam has been touched by to-day's services?"

"With God all things are possible," said Fredrick Stanton as he went out. He recalled, as he hurried on through the darkness, that he had said the same to his parishioner concerning Wrightam. Was he to see that miracle of regeneration repeated in the case of this man? It seemed incredible, but his heart prayed for the event as he walked on.

CHAPTER IX

WHEN Stanton reached Wrightam's residence, the young man took him at once to his father's "den," and then hurriedly went into the library, as if afraid of being called in to witness a scene he dreaded.

As Stanton stepped into the room he thought at first that no one was there. There was only one electric light burning instead of a large cluster, and Wrightam was sitting in the far corner of the room.

He did not move until Stanton had advanced into the corner of the room. Then he got up, turning a face toward his visitor—a face that had one predominant mark, the mark of fear.

He held out his hand.

"I am glad you came, Dr. Stanton," he said hurriedly. And then, after an awkward moment, he suddenly went to the door, and shut and locked it. When he had Stanton again he asked him to be seated, but he walked up and down with growing agitation.

"Dr. Stanton, you will not understand me. But I must tell you because I am afraid."

"Afraid! Of what?"

"That is something I do not know. But all the day I have been oppressed. I never had a premonition in all my life. It is the farthest from my nature to have fears for the future. But I cannot shake off this feeling. And I must tell you to see if you could help me."

Stanton, in growing astonishment, looked intently at the man. Some strange experience had taken possession of him. There was the same apparently coarse physical outward bearing that had always distinguished J. B. Wrightam. He was a college-educated man, but a certain grain of vulgar crudeness, a harsh fibre of personality that clung to him in spite of the culture of the schools. Nothing but the touch of Almighty God could soften this coarseness, and up to this time in his life J. B. Wrightam was absolutely without this grace. He was as much a pagan as any man that ever lived in any age. And Stanton, sitting there that night in that luxurious room, witnessing the remarkable conflict in this man's soul, was, in spite of his faith, startled at the growing transformation in this specimen of industry, this commercial magnate, a nominal church member and social aristocrat, who knew absolutely nothing of the Christ-rule of life, and who so far had been a selfish, proud, worldly man, existing solely for riches and power and pleasure.

"Dr. Stanton, I am not prepared to die and meet my God. Do you believe in final judgment?"

"I do. I believe not only in a final judgment, but in a day-by-day judgment."

Wrightam stopped in his walk.

"Is that the final judgment I fear. What is it I am experiencing? Can you tell me?" The question came as if forced from him by some inward terror.

"Is it conviction, or only fear of punishment caused by some unexpected entrance of thought of the future into a godly life?" Stanton asked himself. When he spoke, it was with more caution and kindness; for he was very much in the dark as to Wrightam's condition.

"Can you give me the cause of this feeling? Have you any date for its beginning?"

After a moment's hesitation, Wrightam said, "I think it dates from your preaching this morning."

"And you say the predominant feeling you now have is fear?"

"A feeling of terror. I cannot sleep. I have been thinking all day of Harwood. He died doing his duty as he saw it. I cannot die that way or any other."

Stanton determined to go at the root of the matter and be frankly plain of speech.

"Mr. Wrightam, are you afraid to die, as you say, because of the selfish, godless life you have lived, or simply because you fear punishment from an angry God?"

Wrightam stopped again in his walk and his face flamed up for a moment with passion. It would have been no great surprise to Stanton then if the man had struck him or ordered him out of the house. But a spirit of convulsion shook him, and he answered Stanton's question by asking him one.

"Have you ever felt helpless in the presence of some impending danger? Helpless as a child in the grasp of a giant? Then you know how I feel."

He resumed his walk, and Stanton persisted in his query.

"But do you feel convicted of guilt? Is your present feeling prompted by a knowledge of God as a punisher of sin?"

"I do not know," Wrightam answered, as if in despair. "I know that I fear with unspeakable dread the thought of death."

Stanton was silent, thinking hard. He had never met a case like this, and he kept praying, as he watched Wrightam, that wisdom might be given him to say the right word, to do the right thing.

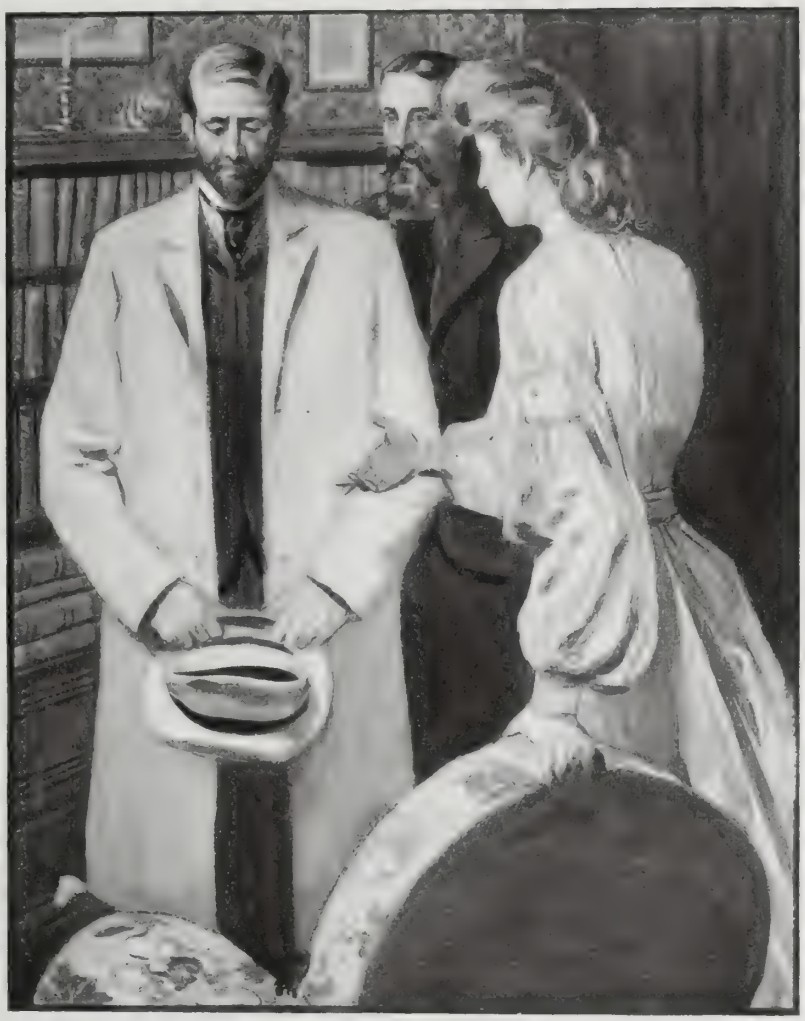
"Mr. Wrightam, would you be afraid to die if you knew you had always tried to do the will of God?"

"I don't know. I only know the fact of my present fear."

"Do you believe God is love?"

Wrightam did not seem to hear, and Stanton asked the question again.

"I don't know. What do I know about God?" He turned towards Stanton fiercely. "Curse you!" he exclaimed suddenly. "It is all your doing. What do you care for your social gospel? It is all rot. Leave me alone. What shall J. B. Wrightam have to do with your theories of a Brotherhood? It is all intangible, preposterous, impossible. Do you hear? Get out of my house, you miserable meddler with things that don't concern you!" He shook his fist in Stanton's face, and every mean demon of hate and selfishness and past riot, of evil ambitions, and, above all, of gold-thirst and greed struggled up through the soul to battle for their own in the presence of the Christ of God, the Holy One, who had come up to the tombs to unchain this maniac and set him free and clothed in his right mind.



"MR. HARVEY," SAID MILDRED, SPIRITEDLY, "WE ARE NOT WILLING TO WAIT"

Something of this great truth gleamed instantly on the soul of Stanton as Wrightam confronted him. Under the strong emotion of the scene, he had risen from his seat and taken a step towards the door. He knew Wrightam would not offer him any personal violence, but he was still doubtful as to the extent of conviction that he struggled to smoulder.

"You sent for me. Why?"

"I don't know! I fear! O my God! The fear! Dr. Stanton! Pardon me! Do not leave me alone! Pray for me! Do something! I am not ready to die!"

Stanton grasped at that one word, "Pray!" He kneeled. And his prayer was based on a simple, child-like faith in the promise of the Holy Spirit. He did not know that Wrightam had gone over by the window and was crouching down on the wide window seat, a remarkably strange figure as compared with his usual bold, aggressive, assumptive manner.

But when the prayer was over and Stanton had risen, the sight of Wrightam, silent and immovable, struck him as a new phase of an extraordinary evening's experience.

He waited for the magnate to speak, but Wrightam was dumb. Then Stanton spoke again, gently, but Wrightam still kept the same attitude. What was passing in his soul? Some infinite struggle was being waged between the unequal forces of right and wrong, between demons and angels, between the devil and the Son of God. What battle-ground more historic, more terrific in its charge and countercharge, more tragic in its defeats, more glorious in its victories! A soul that for forty-five years had allowed hell's sullen, but exultant spirits to camp on God's holy ground could not, without a rebellion that partook of downright revolution, dethrone the usurping forces and put the rightful Prince in his own place. Stanton, awed at the sight, in spite of the marvels of regeneration he had witnessed in the mill men, felt as if the scene were almost too sacredly personal to view. He spoke to Wrightam again; getting no answer, he walked toward the door, saying to himself, "I will leave him alone with God to fight out the battle." At the door, as he turned the key in the lock, he said aloud, "I am going, Brother Wrightam. If you need me, send for me."

Still no word or sign that Wrightam was conscious of Stanton's presence. He did not move or turn his head. Stanton went out into the hall, shutting the door of the "den," and as he was going out of the house, Wrightam's wife came downstairs and stopped at the foot of them. With a gesture she beckoned Stanton to wait. The sight of this woman reminded Stanton with a shock of what was in store for Wrightam in case his soul was won in the battle now being desperately waged only a few feet away. Mrs. Wrightam was a beautiful woman, magnificently decorated, or disfigured, according as you have been brought up to regard it, with expensive jewelry, and her whole attitude was one of superiority as a member of that most select inner circle of the most fashionable Lenox society, that revolved in a constant succession of parties, receptions, dinners, theatres, fads, dress parade, a little surface knowledge of books and events, a religious observance in morocco-covered prayer books during Lent, and a total disregard of all Christian teaching on the subject of humility, sacrifice, true prayer service, and the giving of one's self for the redemption of the world. What were the Lenox mills to the wife and daughter of J. B. Wrightam? Nothing, absolutely nothing but a source of revenue to the Wrightam family and its need of luxuries. As to the men and women who worked there, who lived in the tenements, who were at the centre of the industrial whirlpool that sucked them in and out, Mrs. Wrightam had no thought except that of a turbulent mass that fought her husband's interests, and might possibly endanger his financial profits. Can you imagine a creature, gifted with wonderful physical graces, clothed with garments that were representative of a whole year's salary of hundreds of honest public servants, going through a world filled with God's need, and absolutely having no higher or larger thought of life every day than how she might increase her social standing as the leader of the most haughty, exclusive and wealthy section of Lenox society? This was J. B. Wrightam's wife. She had been divorced from her first husband on account of incompatibility of temper, and she had married the mill magnate, so society said, on account of his great wealth. Her two children were at home with her, Alfred, the young man who had summoned Stanton that night, and Eileen the daughter, two years younger.

"Dr. Stanton. Is Mr. Wrightam ill—or——?" she said, pointing towards the door of the "den."

"I think not. He is——" Stanton was uncertain what to say. How should this woman be made to understand what was happening to her husband?

"What is the matter with him? I have not seen him all day. He did not come in to dinner. I am going to see what is the matter."

She took a step towards the door. Stanton spoke quietly. "I do not think Mr. Wrightam ought to be disturbed, madam. Excuse me, but I know something of the situation, of the experience Mr. Wrightam is having—and——"

"What do you mean, sir?" the woman spoke sharply. "Situation! Experience! What do you mean?"

"I mean, madam, that Mr. Wrightam is passing through a religious crisis in his life, and it would be wise to leave him alone just now."

She paused an instant as she stood in the centre of the hallway, her tall figure gleaming under the lights.

"Religious crisis!"

She laughed, as if the thought gave her some amusement. "Religious crisis! I think you are mistaken, sir. J. B. have religious crisis! It would be a miracle!"

The Coming Revival

FROM various parts of the country the welcome news comes of an earnest and deep-seated desire for a revival of religion. Here and there evangelistic meetings are being held, and the results indicate that the Holy Spirit is moving among the people. Souls are being won, and many heretofore careless and indifferent, if not positively hostile to religion, are giving themselves to Christ. If this movement is general, if there are in other communities men who are being drawn by a power that they do not understand toward a change of life, the responsibility of the Church is serious. The opportunity of reaping a harvest that is ripe, should not be allowed to pass unused. Every former revival has begun within the Church. It has started with a toning-up of the spiritual life of its members, and earnest prayer for increased sanctification. Thence the circle has widened, and the invitation to outsiders has gone forth with unexpected results. The Church has been surprised to find that there were many who had been prepared for its invitation by the Holy Spirit's influence, and were already near to the Kingdom of God. Is it possible that we are now on the verge of such a movement?

Why should not a test be made? There must be in every city, scattered among the Churches of various denominations, many earnest Christian men and women to whom there would be nothing so gladdening as a real and genuine revival. Would it not be possible for such people to meet together, regardless of denominational differences, for the definite purpose of pleading with God for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit? There is no doubt that such prayers would be heard. God is waiting to bless his people and is more ready to give than they are to ask. It is their indifference that holds back the blessing, and that impresses the world with doubt of the vital power of religion.

The beginning of the movement may be small. It may be that only a few would have the faith in prayer that all Christians profess, but if the few would continue their prayers the number would soon increase. There is a law of the Spirit of Life, as the Apostle declared, and that law is sure in its operation. The Spirit is given to those who ask for it, and with that help there is no limit to what may be expected. When the Churches are really united in entreating a blessing it will surely come. God has said that he will be inquired of for these things. Earnest prayer that he will arouse his Church to embrace the present opportunity, even though uttered by a few, would result in a stirring among the dry bones. The Church would be moved to the performance of its duty, and with the Church in earnest the world would speedily respond. The day of God's power is not past; the old Gospel is still effective in the salvation of souls; it only needs that we avail ourselves of the means within our reach, and God in his own way and in his own time, will grant us the long-expected blessing.

The Rescue of China

AMERICAN diplomacy has again scored a signal triumph in the direction of international honor and justice, through the sagacity of our State Department, in detecting and foiling the scheme for the partition of China. As told in the Washington despatches, Secretary Hay recently learned of an arrangement among the "neutral nations" of Europe to step in at the opportune moment, either during the present war or immediately after its close, and occupy large portions of the Chinese Empire, with the ostensible purpose of guaranteeing Chinese neutrality. The prospective plan would have been a repetition, though on a much larger scale, of former seizures, under which valuable territory was occupied and permanently held. It is not yet clear whether the new pretext would have been the checking of the "yellow peril," or the forestalling of a Chino-Japanese alliance. In any event, the contemplated seizure, in all likelihood, would have been the first step toward the complete dismemberment of China, and its reduction to helpless insignificance, while the "neutral powers" would have exploited the valuable commercial and other resources of the country to their own advantage.

Whatever might have resulted from this precious scheme—as fine a piece of Machiavellian diplomacy as has lately come to light—it has been nipped in the bud by the vigorous action of our State Department. Secretary Hay addressed an "identical note" to all the governments interested, asking them to renew their former pledges to respect the "administrative entity" of China, to maintain the principle of the "open door," and to seek and accept no special advantages from China without the knowledge of all the nations interested in the Chinese question. To this just demand, all the governments have replied, giving prompt assent to our propositions, some of them even commending the "soundness and wisdom" of the policy involved. Russia alone stands solitarily aloof with her attitude undefined; but as all the Powers hitherto friendly to the Czar's government have assented to our propositions and given the required pledges, any hostile intentions Russia may harbor toward China will now doubtless be materially modified. With a general revolution impending at home, if not already under way, Russia is not now liable to undertake a lone programme, on belligerent lines, in the East.

Under the specious pretense of acquiring "spheres of influence," essential to preserving the balance of power, or of "establishing neutral zones," the present generation has witnessed many violations of the territorial rights of weak nations. If there be any virtue in a "strong government," it lies in employing its strength and influence for the suppression of such practices. Robbery is plain robbery, whether the criminal be a great nation, a State, or corporation, or an individual, The plot for the spoliation of China was a contemplated robbery of the first magnitude.

All honor to John Hay, through whose statesmanlike sagacity and courage the plunderers have been unmasked and their plot brought to naught. Their success, while it might have developed China commercially to their advantage, would have been a serious set-back in the progress of the Mongol race, in that better civilization toward which it is now surely tending.

The Unemployed

IN responding with such signal frankness to our invitation to a discussion of the urgent problem: "What is the best and most practical method of dealing with the vast multitude of the unemployed in New York this winter," the writers of the remarkable collection of letters which appear elsewhere in this issue, have rendered excellent service in a most worthy cause. Speaking as they do from an intimate knowledge of the situation, their suggestions have the stamp of practicability, and, if not furnishing an active solution of the problem, are nevertheless full of interest from the humanitarian, as well as the business point of view.

As the industrial situation in New York is reflected to a greater or lesser degree in every large city in the Union, we have felt justified in presenting this Symposium of expert opinion, believing it may serve a useful end, and be a stimulus to right action in every industrial centre, and especially in those cities where there is suffering from similar causes.

Among the suggestions offered, the most favored are these:

1. The city to employ the idle thousands on extensive public works.
2. The charitably disposed to unite for affording temporary relief.
3. Set the idle to street cleaning, clearing off the snow, etc.
4. Establish more Free Labor Bureaus, like that of The Bowery Mission.
5. Open a number of soup-houses.
6. Register willing employers, and also willing but idle workers and bring them together.
7. Secure legislative action to authorize large expenditures for public works.
8. All the churches should unite in an emergency relief movement.

Never has the metropolis known a season when suffering was so general as now — and this at a time when the country, according to all accounts, is prosperous, when business men are counting their profits by millions of dollars, and when fashionable pleasures and costly social display are at their maximum. The things being so, one may well ask, why is it that the feelings are harrowed by the spectacle of a great army of unemployed walking the streets and looking in vain for work, or hiding among their poverty and misery in tenement hovels? Why should it be possible for thousands of men—honest and industrious as they are, and by no means tramps or mendicants—to have fallen so low that there would hardly seem to be a lower depth, short of actual starvation?

This is the problem which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD presented for elucidation by the leading men of New York; whether their replies come near to a solution, we leave to the judgment of our readers. In a case like the present, when quick action is imperative, if any thing is to be done to relieve the situation, it is useless to speculate on what might be accomplished by legislation a year hence. Our Park Commissioners or the State Legislature might do much to help matters if the unemployed workingmen had a strong and earnest champion to advocate their cause.

Two immediate duties must be clear to the minds of every one who reads these letters: (1) Help those nearest at hand who are in need; (2) Furnish work, whenever possible, to at least one unemployed person in your own neighborhood. If any considerable number should act on this principle, the situation would be quickly relieved. If farmers, householders, and employers of labor generally, within fifty miles of New York, will lend a hand by co-operating with the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau, they, at least, will have the consciousness of having done their share toward lifting the burden.

Regularity in School Attendance

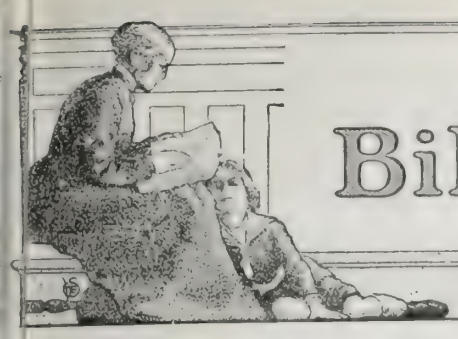
TEACHERS insist, and with reason, that children shall attend school regularly. Parents often allow little interruptions which the children beg for, but which, in the end, seriously conflict with the school work and lower the children's standing. When a boy or girl is obviously suffering from overwork, or is physically run down, the proper course is to remove him or her from school for a month or a quarter, with the understanding that there will be no complaint if loss of promotion follows the absence. It is often a necessity that a child shall wholly intermit school for a portion of the year. But while in attendance, for every reason let the attendance be prompt, exact, and continuous. A half day missed now, a whole day again, and constant tardiness are very injurious to the moral character of a child, giving the idea that punctual performance of duty may be left to caprice.

Among the Workers

—DR. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN will again conduct the Devotional hours at Chautauqua, N. Y., this year, in the week of August 6–11. An eminent preacher who will appear this year at Chautauqua, N. Y., for the first time is the Rev. Charles Cuthbert Hall, President of Union Theological Seminary.

—REV. J. A. HAINER and Prof. B. P. Stout, of Providence, R. I., have just closed a very successful series of evangelical services in the Merrimac Street Baptist Church, Manchester, N. H., Rev. N. L. Colby, pastor. Not only has the church been wonderfully helped, but many souls have been won for the Master. More than one hundred asked for prayers during the two weeks of meetings.

—A RELIGIOUS revival is in progress in Carrollton, O. Rev. T. J. McRea, of the Methodist Church, assisted by Rev. Wm. Powell, evangelist; Dr. Riker, of Mount Union College, O., and other local ministers, are leading the work. One hundred have been at the altar, many of whom have not been inside a church for many years. The meetings have now been in progress for six weeks, day and night.



The Bible and the Newspaper

The Czar in Peril

FROM St. Petersburg comes the startling report of an attempt on the life of the Czar. While attending a public ceremony on January 19, a salute was fired in his honor, but one of the guns was loaded with grape, and was aimed at a pavilion in which he was standing. Happily, he was not hurt, but one member of his bodyguard was killed. The official reports represent the affair as an accident, but public opinion persists in regarding it as a conspiracy.

The occasion was the annual ceremony known as the blessing of the waters of the Neva. The Czar, with the Czarina and his mother and the officers and ladies of his court, attend the ceremony in state. The river at this season is coated with ice three feet thick, on which a pavilion is built, where the ceremony takes place. The Czar takes part in it, while the ladies of the court watch it from the windows of the Winter Palace overlooking the river. A hole is cut in the ice through which the Metropolitan bishop lowers a crucifix into the water and afterwards a golden chalice containing water from the Jordan. This he hands to the Czar, pronouncing a blessing on the river, its vessels and their freights. At the conclusion of the ceremony the guns on the river bank fire a salute. At this celebration the third gun of the saluting battery gave a harsher report and there was a rain of bullets. A shell burst over the pavilion in which the Czar was standing, a flag above the pavilion was torn to pieces and the windows of the Winter Palace where the ladies were standing were shattered.

The battery from which the shot was fired was under the nominal command of the Grand Duke Mecklenburg-Strelitz, a near kinsman of the Czar, and all its officers belong to the most aristocratic and exclusive circles. An inquiry was at once begun, and the report was given out that the case-shot had been accidentally left in the gun, but the report is not credited. It is pointed out that if the gun had been aimed a little lower, the entire dynasty, including the Czar's brother and his uncles, the Grand Dukes, would have been wiped out. There is little doubt that the shell was designedly placed in the gun, and that assassination was intended. The captain of the battery and his lieutenant were arrested. The occurrence is all the more ominous, because it shows that disloyalty exists in the army, which is the mainstay of the dynasty.

The incident is thrown into the background by the horrible massacre which took place on Sunday, January 22. A strike of 60,000 iron and steel workers had taken place in St. Petersburg and was speedily followed by strikes in other trades, the workmen in some instances being compelled to join in the movement. The number of men on strike grew, until it reached half a million men. They were led by a young priest named Father Gopon, who drew up a petition for presentation to the Czar, in which the grievances of the men were clearly and ably stated. He pointed out that the men were so heavily taxed that they could not live, that the present system of government, by the chiefs of bureaus, had forced Russia into a shameful war and was bringing the country to ruin, and begged the Czar to grant a free parliament as the only remedy.

THE WINTER PALACE BY THE NEVA, THE WINDOWS OF WHICH WERE BROKEN

It was arranged by the men that they should go to the Palace on Sunday afternoon to present the petition. They begged the Czar to receive them, and promised to go unarmed. True to their plan, they went in procession toward the Palace, but found their way barred by a regiment of Cossacks. As the men pushed forward the Cassacks fired a blank volley, and then a volley of ball. The people fell by hundreds. Then the Cossacks were ordered to charge the crowd. They obeyed with alacrity. They rode recklessly into the unarmed throng, slashing right and left with their swords, sparing neither old nor young, men nor women. There, and in other parts of the city, their cruelty was displayed. In all, it is officially reported that 2,100 people were killed, and 5,000 wounded, but it is believed that these figures are far below the actual number who fell.

It was evident that the Government had planned the massacre with fiendish coolness and premeditation. The unarmed people received no warning, but were allowed to assemble and begin their march. Only when the crowd had become dense and retreat was impossible, were they mowed down like sheep. The result is still in doubt. With Finland discontented, with Poland on the verge of revolt, with the peasantry exasperated with this outrage, a revolution may take place. The people are desperate, and by the power of the army alone can the dynasty be saved. If the Czar would listen to the warning he has received, and would grant the people a constitution, there might still be hope. The voice of the ancient prophet points out to him the only way of safety:

Remove violence and spoil, and executive judgment and justice, take away your exactions from my people, saith the Lord God (Ezek. 45: 9).

Pioneer of the Diamond Fields

A telegram from South Africa announces the death of a noted man. He was practically the discoverer of the famous diamond mines of Kimberley. In 1867 he was making a trip through the Hopetoun district, when he visited a house occupied by a Dutch farmer. During his stay, a son of the farmer showed him his collection of pretty pebbles, which he had found in the neighborhood. One of them was so bright and transparent that the visitor thought it must be valuable. A small sum secured the pebble, and the traveler took it back with him to Capetown. He showed it to his friends, but none of them thought it had any value; but eventually he submitted it to the chief mineralogist of the colony, who pronounced it a diamond. The news soon spread, and a company was organized to work the soil, which has become enormously rich. The discoverer, however, took no interest in it. He was simply a trader, and he continued his business, and has now died in his store. It is extraordinary that he took no steps to profit by his discovery. Like some who know of the value of religion, yet never secure it for themselves, this man missed the opportunity of his life and died poor.

The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it (Heb. 4: 2).

Fumigating Books

Attention has recently been called to the danger of propagating disease, which exists in public libraries. A patient who is sick with some infectious disease sends for a book from the library to while away the weary hours of convalescence. The book is read and returned to the library, and is given out to some other person who, in reading it, breathes the germs which have fallen among the leaves, and contracts the same disease. An attempt to counteract this danger has just been made in the Carnegie Library, at Mount Vernon. A steel cabinet seven feet high by three feet wide has been constructed, and made air-tight with glass doors. In this cabinet the books are suspended so that the leaves fall open. The doors are closed and the cabinet is filled with a vapor produced by a mixture of formalin and ammonia. The books remain in the cabinet twelve hours, at the end of which time they are taken out and put on the shelves, ready for use. It has been found that no germ can live after being subjected to this treatment. Books specially prepared with germs, became perfectly harmless after going through the process. The experiment has proved so thoroughly successful that it will doubtless be tried in other libraries, and so the danger of spreading disease will be avoided. We wish it was possible to discover a process that would counteract the moral danger that there is in reading some books. The number of people who lose their lives through germs of disease that are found in books is small compared with the number who contract moral pollution from reading bad books.

Be not deceived: evil communications corrupt good morals (I.Cor. 15: 33 R. V.)

BRIEF NOTES

The municipality of Nagasaki has voted $4,500 to entertain Russian prisoners who pass through the city on their way to the interior.

Henry Phipps, the former associate of Andrew Carnegie in business, has devoted a million dollars to the erection of model tenements in New York. The trustees will comprise New York's most prominent citizens.

In both south and north Wales, scores of villages have been so influenced by the revival that literary and political clubs and popular amusements have had to give way to the revival meetings, which are held morning, afternoon and evening, and marked by solemn and uplifting scenes.

Dr. Tupper's Daily Text-book from the Sun of Righteousness has had a large sale. The first edition is exhausted, and a second has been issued. In order to encourage Christian workers to give them to people whom the book may reach, Dr. Tupper will supply them at a reduced rate to agents in such cases. They may be had in parcels of twenty for a dollar. Apply to Dr. Tupper, 29 Gramercy Park, New York.

A NEW Symposium

THE DARK PROBLEM

Leading Philanthropists, Sociologists, Employe
TO PROVIDE FOR THE GREAT ARMY OF ID

"HOW would you provide for the unemployed Laborers this winter?"

This question has been submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to a number of the most prominent authorities on the subject, in New York and elsewhere. The best of the answers to this most urgent question of the day—which affects not only the metropolis but the whole country—are given herewith, and form a Symposium of remarkable interest. These replies contain some valuable suggestions for immediate remedies for the sad situation, and practical ideas for the relief of the industrious unemployed and the deserving poor, that are worthy the consideration of employers, legislators and all who are philanthropically inclined.

HON. WM. SULZER, M.C.

WM. FELLOWES MORGAN

HON. JOHN D. CRIMMINS

In asking the question how to provide for the unemployed, statements were made as follows: New York has at present the largest proportion of unemployed of any great city in the country. It is estimated that there are from 50,000 to 75,000 (some even estimate the number at 100,000) idle men and boys in the city to-day, or considerably more than at this same time last year. Fifty thousand school children, Mr. Robert Hunter, the well known sociological authority has stated, go to school breakfastless, which means idle fathers. So overwhelmed is the Department of Public Charities with applications from men out of work, that it finds itself unable to cope adequately with the situation. The metropolis this winter is facing a problem with regard to the unemployed such as has never been known.

The immediate question is: What can be done, and done quickly, with this great army of unemployed? How give practical relief to the willing, industrious, and the deserving? Would not such relief best be given in the form of work, rather than charity?

Among those who have sent replies to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S invitation to shed light on the Dark Problem of the Unemployed, are the following:

PROF. WALTER A. WYCKOFF of Princeton University, eminent author and sociologist.

HON. JACOB A. CANTOR, former President Manhattan Borough.

JOHN D. CRIMMINS, Esq., a leading citizen and large employer of labor.

JUDGE G. M. VAN HOESEN, New York Court of Common Pleas.

MRS. BELVA LOCKWOOD, well known writer on sociological subjects.

HON. WM. SULZER, Congressman from New York City.

HON. LEROY B. CRANE, City Magistrate, New York.

BISHOP HENRY C. POTTER, N. Y. City.

HON. JAMES E. DOUGHERTY, Deputy Commissioner of Public Charities.

REV. R. S. MACARTHUR, Calvary Baptist Church, New York, etc., etc.

Union Tyranny and Liquor as Causes; Work on City Improvements the Remedy

BY CITY JUDGE LEROY B. CRANE

"HOW the unemployed should be provided for this winter," is a subject of so much importance, requiring so much thoughtful consideration, that it is quite out of the question to solve the problem with any degree of satisfaction.

A large percentage of idleness among the working men is caused by the tyranny of labor unions.

At least eighty per cent. of the misery and suffering among the working classes comes from the use of liquor, and that should be impressed on every man woman, and child on God's earth, high or low, rich or poor.

There should be an eleventh commandment, namely: "Thou shalt not touch, taste, or handle, thyself, nor give to thy fellow-man, spirituous liquors of any kind."

The first step, to my mind, would be to have the city authorities, in co-operation with the men of millions in this great municipality, devise a plan of city improvements for the winter months, whereby work might be given to those willing to accept it, thus bringing immediate relief.

Second. There might be erected in three or more locations, large lodging-houses, and in connection therewith, and on the spot, industries of some kind, simple to understand, where men could find employment for a few months at least, the productions thereof being sold throughout the city or country.

Third. No man should be given charity without work, unless in sickness or distress, for indiscriminate alms-giving breeds idleness and crime.

Fourth. A society might be formed on the lines of the Children's Aid Society in this city, backed by the authorities and men of means, such as Messrs. Rockefeller, Carnegie, Morgan, the Goulds, Vanderbilts, Russell Sage, the Belmonts, Astors, and men of this class, whereby an agent representing it, might be detailed to each of our Municipal and Criminal Courts to take up cases of evictions, debt, etc., in fact all cases of misfortune, and give speedy relief.

They Should be Employed by the City on Park Construction and Other Public Works

BY HON. JOHN D. CRIMMINS

THIS is a difficult question for me to answer; in fact it is a poser. There are no means of employing the thousands you refer to, as no preparations have been made for their employment. In the midst of winter, when these unfortunates flock to our city, is no time to make preparations; preparations should have been made and completed long ago.

It has always been my idea that the government, national, state, and city, should reserve certain large public improvements for emergencies such as this, and thus offer a field for employment. It is not when business is active and men are employed, in my judgment, that the city should move in large undertakings, for then the city is a competitor with other enterprises and with business in general. There will be periods of depression, and they come so suddenly and unexpectedly that we cannot anticipate them six months in advance. The character of improvements I refer to are those that require the simplest labor, such as park construction. We have large acreage in park lands in all the boroughs, so that character of employment could be widely distributed in the Bronx, Manhattan Kings, Queens, and Richmond.

GIVE THEM WORK IN THE PARKS

For many years in the early part of winter, the Department of Parks has been accustomed to lay off a large number of men. This should not be, as it increases the number of the unemployed. My idea would be that the Commissioner of Parks be authorized to prepare for the employment of men in park construction and improvement during the winter months, and be further authorized to dispense with the services of these men as soon as possible in the latter part of March, or the beginning of April. This same idea might be carried out in connection with our Croton water improvements, reservoirs, and other places where men could be usefully employed.

Objection might be made that this would be an additional expense to the taxpayers, as the money to pay for these improvements and for this employment would have to be raised by taxation. This objection would fail, when it is taken into consideration, first, that this employment is required for the improvement and completion of the parks, and second, that when labor is employed, it consumes, and the money is not taken out of the country, but is circulated and comes back to us. The best circulating medium is in the employment of labor for money.

The class of labor we are speaking of, is that class which is employed during the other seasons of the year, but finds itself idle in the winter months, in consequence of owners and contractors closing down their works during the inclement weather of the winter months; this is done partially for economy.

THE WORKERS NOT BLAMELESS

Unfortunately for themselves, the men, in consequence of the arbitrary and unreasonable conditions they create in their unions, have made it almost unanimous on th employers to be indifferent to t of their men. The men leave abruptly, and prevent those wi from coming into employment.

SUBSIDIES OF CHARITY

…of 100,000 idle men in midwi…ter is a grim fact, and something must be done to meet it; but while we are at work upon that problem, let us not forget that by much of our "charity" we are simply subsidizing the parasitical industries that are drawing the life-blood of multitudes of workers. When once we have grasped the idea that we shall make no progress in the solution of the problem of the unemployed and kindred problems, until we make it impossible for the parasitical trades to exploit the poorest of the workers and thrive upon a subsidy of "charity" to their destitute employees, we shall have some prospect of permanent success in dealing with such a situation as exists this winter in New York.

THE BOWERY MISSION'S WORK

What you tell me of this work of the Bowery Mission, in co-operation with the Municipal Lodging-House, in establishing a Free Labor Bureau, "which, without cost to employers, is sending able-bodied workingmen to any point where labor is required in nearby States," interests me deeply, as evidence of work in precisely the right direction. I know, from personal experience, that for men willing to work, there is no lack of work in the country, taken as a whole. Our congested labor markets are merely local. In the immediate neighborhood of my university the farmers, utterly unable to get help, have been obliged to work day and night to house their crops before the coming of the winter. I venture to say that for every honest idle man in New York who will pledge himself to work until next autumn's crop is housed, there is a good home, and work at good wages, with a responsible farmer, within fifty miles of the City Hall. Free Labor Bureaus, such as you describe, might work this field to immense advantage. That it could afford only a partial solution, at the best, of the present situation, I am well aware. Not all of the idle men on your streets are of a kind that responsible farmers could take into their homes, and some of them are not free to go fifty miles into the country, and leave destitute wives and children behind them. But the development of Free Labor Bureaus such as the Bowery Mission, might go far into the ranks of the 100,000 by way of discriminating between enforced idlers and the professionally idle.

"PARASITICAL INDUSTRIES"

When once we have made an end of the subsidies that we now pay to the parasitical industries by a logical development of the factory system and trades unionism, we may hope to establish a work-list on such a basis as to practically solve the present problem of the unemployed, and at the same time to relieve "charity" of its present obligation to help to support the very industries that are doing most to create poverty.

Meanwhile, I know of no better way of meeting the present emergency than through the work of Free Labor Bureaus, which will aim to bring about throughout this country a better adjustment between the demand for labor and its supply.

Let all the Churches Unite in an Emergency Relief Movement

BY EX-CONGRESSMAN JOHN DEWITT WARNER, N. Y.

THERE is not time to completely develop a new organization that would cover the field. It is, therefore, a question of how far existing organizations can be used. I know of but one class of institutions — our churches—always in theory, largely in practice, equally in touch with the unemployed and the well-to-do. Either, or several of these—the Roman Catholic, Protestant Episcopal, Hebrew, Methodist, etc., could call a conference of these and all other church organizations, which could at once appoint a large and representative Central Committee. This in turn could promptly name an Executive Committee, commanding from the start the co-operation of every church organization in this city.

This Executive Committee could so canvass the field, determine on the urgency and sort of relief needed, assign local work, and allot relief funds to these or to existing institutions, as most promptly, efficiently, and economically to meet needs found.

I do not suggest that this would be a good permanent arrangement; but for a few months — while inspired by the motives that would dominate at the start, and guided by those chosen for the duty rather than seeking it—it would doubtless merit full confidence and support.

State and City Aid, Local Soup-Houses, Bread Tickets and Free Labor Bureau the Immediate Remedy

BY BELVA A. LOCKWOOD

IN the congestion of all great cities, it has been found that from time to time, on account of the fluctuation of trade, the diminution, instead of the increase, of manufactures in certain lines, to say nothing of the improvidence of the drink habit, the pool-room, the race track, and immoralities of various kinds, that thousands of men are pressed to the wall dependent upon charity, carrying down with them in many instances innocent women and children, and sometimes the women themselves, by drink, carelessness and unthrift, are to blame.

OPEN SOUP-HOUSES

Neither reason, education, morality or religion can relieve an empty stomach. It calls for heroic treatment. Open immediately soup houses in every precinct, where a meal can be had for five cents. Establish, as the Bowery Mission has done, a free labor bureau near every soup-house, and announce through the press that labor will be furnished with commensurate pay to the unemployed, and require each idle man and woman to visit these employment places for work, and register his name and address.

Ask the Mayor and Common Council to vote some public work, or street improvement, or both, upon which these men may be employed. To keep the streets clean of that great city, and wash them down as the streets of Berlin and Paris are kept, this alone would employ many men. The great sewer system of Paris is due to the efforts of Napoleon to find work for his disbanded army. If money enough were furnished, light manufactures, as paper boxes, baskets, brooms, chair-caning, etc., might be established, in which women and children could earn a living wage.

The problem of the 50,000 breakfastless children has been solved by several cities in Europe, including the "East End" in London, in Berlin and Paris. The city hires a caterer, who is established in or near every public school building, who supplies, under inspection, a breakfast or lunch of light sanitary food suitable for children, composed of milk, soup, and bread, which can be had for two or three cents, and charges it to the school fund. No hungry child can study to advantage, or if he should itwould be at the expense of health.

Non-Supporting Aliens Considered as a Factor in the Unemployed Problem

BY FRANK P. SARGENT, U. S. COMMISSIONER-GENERAL OF IMMIGRATION

MANY aliens are arriving at the various ports without funds, and while, in many instances, alleged relatives come forward and state that they will care for the aliens, it is found that shortly after landing the said aliens become public charges. It was therefore believed that the declaration contained in your letter should be brought to the attention of the public, in order that the efforts that are being made by the Bureau of Immigration to lessen the burden which must of necessity fall upon the charity organizations if aliens are admitted who are not self-supporting, or whose friends are unable to maintain them, would be supported by the public when these facts were known.

Applications for labor has been received by the Bureau from different sections of the country. The Bureau is not permitted,

A FATHER'S FAITH

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

"MY only son is sick of a fever, nigh unto death. 'There is no hope for him,' says the physician. I will not have it so. I have heard of him whom they call Christ. I have heard how he changed water into wine at the marriage feast in Cana. If he had power to do that, he has power to do other things. I hear that he is again in Cana. I will have asses saddled and go at once, and beseech of him to come back with me that he may restore my son." We can imagine the nobleman of Capernaum giving this account of the miracle:

"I have reached Cana. It is about seven o'clock in the evening. It is dark in the streets, but I see people flitting about with their tiny lamps like glowworms. I will inquire in which house I may find the Master. With some misgivings I seek him, for he may not wish to be troubled. His first words are certainly not assuring: 'Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will in no wise believe.' I suppose he recognized in me the court officer of the king, the proud man that I really am, but my pride is all under now, and I think only of my son, and I cry: 'Sir, come down ere my son die.' How benign his face, how gentle his manner, as he says: 'Go thy way, thy son liveth.' Can I doubt his word? No, for his power knows no limit. The few miles that lie between him and my son are no barrier. I will rest on his word, and abide in Cana to-night; to-morrow I will return to Capernaum, and all will be well.

"What is yonder cloud of dust? Riders and horses are speeding with all haste. As they approach, I recognize two of my own servants. They draw the rein and stand beside me, saying: 'We are on our way to tell you that there is no need to bring the good Master, because your son is no longer sick.' I ask what time he was made well, and they reply: 'At the seventh hour the fever left him.' It was that very hour the Master said: 'Thy son liveth.'

"I reach my home, my beloved son comes out to greet me with the glow of health upon his cheek, instead of the fever flush. I find the happy mother inside the home. It is a time for family thanksgiving. I gather all my household together, including servants. And we all become believers in Jesus as our Saviour and King, and the Saviour and King of all. A Christian home ours shall ever be."

Illustration and Application

I. A Father's Faith. The man believed the word that Jesus had spoken. Here is a nobleman, who is also a noble man. Lady Huntington, of saintly character, unlike most of her titled associates, thanked God for the letter M, in the text: "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called" (I Cor. 1: 26). Why do rank and scholarship and wealth make it harder to be Christlike? Is it not chiefly because they all foster pride, whose offence is that it takes the place of gratitude. The things we are proud of, are usually the things for which we should be humbly grateful to God and to our fellows. "You must be very proud of your talented daughter?" said one. "Rather I am very thankful for her." And the daughter was thankful, too, instead of proud; thankful to God and to her parents, for heredity and training and opportunity. To the proud, God says: "What hast thou that thou didst not receive?" The one thing which is of our own choosing is character, and in that we can all be truly "noble."

This nobleman's case reminds us that sickness and death often humble the proudest. Queen Elizabeth, in her last speech to her last Parliament, said of her great crown, "It seems grander to those who look at it than to those who wear it." The tomb of Cyrus the Great, it is said, bore this inscription: "O man! whosoever thou art, and whensoever thou comest (for come I know thou wilt), I am Cyrus, the founder of the Persian Empire. Envy me not the little earth that covers my body." Louis XIV, looking out at St. Germain, saw a building in the distance, and said, "What building is that?" "Sire, that is the church of St. Denis, where your royal ancestors are buried." He could not endure the sight of a mausoleum which reminded him of his own frailty, and he built another palace with an entirely different outlook. Had not death threatened the nobleman's son, his might never have become a Christian home. Like Isaiah, he learned to put afflictions in his list of God's lovingkindnesses. By threatened death his household learned to really live. The moral sense of the earlier Romans was keen enough to perceive that to the man whom they delighted to honor with a "triumph," there lurked a danger to his character in the excessive adulation accorded him. To neutralize, if possible, this danger, in the midst of the pompous parade of the "triumph," a slave, placed behind the great man, and holding a crown of Etruscan gold in his hand, had the duty of whispering often in his ears, "Remember that thou art but a man." Sickness is the slave that performs this service in our story, and in many another. The nobleman forgets wealth, and learning, and rank, as he exclaims to Christ, "Come down ere my child die," Jesus had said, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe," but speedily this father's faith grew to trust in the very word of Christ. His assurance that the boy twenty miles away would recover, was calmly believed without any miraculous sign. It was the greatest faith anyone had shown to Christ thus far, and it was honored in the instant, and perfect answer to the father's prayer for his son. Let us not miss this perfect picture of faith, which is not some strange feeling, but confidence that Christ will keep his word with us. "How do you know you are saved, my little man?" a boy was asked. "Why Jesus said, 'Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out,' and I'm the 'him,' that came."

"THE NOBLEMAN SAITH UNTO HIM, SIR, COME DOWN ERE MY CHILD DIE"

II. A Saved Son. Thy son liveth. The story, however familiar, must be repeated here, of the Christian soldier found dead on a Southern battlefield, with these words in his Testament, "Thy son liveth," framed in his blood, a cheering message to his bereaved father and mother, which they received like a message from the other world. The real life that begins with the incoming of Christ's life in the soul is "eternal life," on which death hath no power. "He lives most who thinks most, feels noblest, acts the best." This story of a son saved by his father's faith and love brings back the old, old story, ever new, of the prodigal son.

"A wise son maketh a glad father" on earth as well as in heaven. It would seem motive enough to be good and useful, if there were not higher ones that our faithfulness will give our fathers supreme joy. A father came from his farm to see his boy, who had become a doctor.

"Well, son," he said, "how are you getting along?" "I'm not getting along at all," was the disheartened answer. "I'm not doing a thing." Later in the day he went with his son to the "Free Dispensary," where the young doctor had an unsalaried position, and where he spent an hour or more every day. The father sat by, a silent but intensely interested spectator, while twenty-five poor unfortunates received help. The doctor forgot his visitor, while he bent his skilled energies to this task; but hardly had the door closed on the last patient, when the old man burst forth: "I thought you told me that you were not doing anything! Why, if I had helped twenty-five people in a month as much as you have in a morning, I would thank God that my life counted for something." "There isn't any money in it, though," explained the son, somewhat abashed. "Money!" the old man shouted, still scornfully. "Money! What is money in comparison with being of use to your fellowmen? Never mind about money; you go right along at this work every day. I'll go back to the farm, gladly earn money enough to support you as long live—yes, and sleep sound every night with the tho that I have helped you to help your fellow-men."

III. A Christian Home. Himself believed and whole house. A father's faith reinforced by a saved should always bring the whole household to Christ." thou and all thy house into the ark," God said to N (Gen. 7: 1). "As for me and my house," said Jos "we will serve the Lord" (Joshua 24: 15). "Believe the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved"—d stop there, as many do, but read on—"and thy ho (Acts 16: 31). In the case of this nobleman, it s that not only all his family, but all his servants, bec believers. And so it ought to be usually. When in a household are agreed to pray and live for the sa station of all the others, they will very seldom be di pointed. If the grown daughters are not won, there cause. The wife of an American preacher had beautiful daughters, who grew up very worldly, married men as worldly as themselves, to the great g of their parents. Their mother, on her deathbed, knowledged that she was wholly to blame for the wo liness of her daughters, that she had in her heart desi for them beauty, worldly culture and marriages of pro nence. She had her heart's desire, but she lost daughters for Christ.

As for the little girls, we have only to "suffer them come" to Christ. A teacher asked his class each to w down on a slate the answer to this question, "Wh Jesus?" The slates were handed up for inspecti The teacher smiled as he held one in his hand.

"There are some good swers," he said — "so long, some short. But t one is the best of all. C little girl has written sim this: 'Jesus is my very o Saviour.'"

Everywhere Christ mal children who receive him their hearts more poli more kindly, more gl some. Mr. C. G. Trumb writes of a company Christian children encou tered by the Kaiser Ku furst pilgrims in Palestin "We were riding on t tween fertile fields of whe and orchards of olive a mulberry trees, when su denly we heard the soun of high pitched children voices. In an olive orcha by the road, was a rollicl ing, shouting crowd of Sy ian children, having as joll a time as you could wish t see. Swings were goin games were in progress, an it was such a scene of chil life as we had witnessed n where else in Syria. Th children's sunshiny face were the best of all, for the were genuinely happy, a God meant children to be and not as most of the littl sober-faced people in the Holy Land. For these wer Christian children of the village of El Raney, and that ex plained the happy scene. We persuaded them to get to gether in an effective group by the roadside, and ther we caught them with our cameras. Just then a white turbaned candy man hove in sight, and we gave him a franc to 'set up' the entire crowd . . . 'Have you no ticed,' said the Doctor to me, 'that not one of the children has asked baksheesh! Let's get away before they do, so as to have one case on record.' But we did not hurry, and they did not ask. Christianity makes a difference."

Why should not a new Christian home be dedicated like a church? This was done in one case. The clergyman among the guests was asked to bless the house, whereupon he prayed? "Father of all, may this house shelter a happy family; may it be the dearest spot of earth to all the household; may its influence be far-reaching in blessing, and may one of the many mansions in the better country at last receive all who belong to this one."

...he Municipality Should Afford Relief ...y Giving Employment to the Industrious

By Congressman Wm. Sulzer, of New York

...N my opinion, the Municipality of the city of New York should give employment to a large number of these indus...ious and worthy unemployed citizens. It ... one of the greatest duties of government ... see to it that every citizen has a fair ...hance to earn a living.

...If I had my way, there would not be an ...nest idle laboring man in the country. ...hese worthy unemployed workingmen do ...ot ask for charity—they want work. They ...ant to earn their bread in the sweat of ...heir brow—and they do not want to beg. ...n my judgment every man who wants to ...e the honest idle workingmen given em...loyment, should give his best efforts to ...hange, or better existing conditions.

Help the Willing Worker to Employment Outside the City

By Rev. R. S. MacArthur, Calvary Baptist Church, N. Y.

OF course the chance to work is better than any form of charity. The chance to work is the only true charity to willing workmen. Doubtless a considerable number are now getting employment in shoveling snow from our streets; but this is, of course, only temporary. I know of no more practical form of helping worthy workmen than through the Bowery Mission, in co-operation with the Municipal Lodging-House. In sending workingmen out of the city, the bureau paying the cost, the Bowery Mission is certainly doing a nobler work then any similar organization with which I am familiar. Idle workmen should be constantly encouraged to leave New York, and to find homes and employment in country places. It is frequently said that workmen would rather starve in New York, than have food, work and homes in country places. There is doubtless an element of truth in this statement. In encouraging them, therefore, to leave the city, the Bowery Mission is doing service to the city, to the farmers in the country, and to the workingmen themselves.

A "Second Solomon" Needed to Solve the Difficult Problem

By Judge G. M. Van Hoesen, Common Pleas Court

IF I could answer your question I should be a second Solomon. We are told that the country is prosperous: yet you tell me that there are at least one hundred thousand men in the city of New York unemployed, though willing to work; that children go to school hungry and without breakfast. How to find work for those willing to work, how to find it at once, and in time to relieve the distress of the unemployed, I confess I do not know. The economic conditions of the country must be wrong, and yet the people said last month that they ought to continue.

The Bowery Mission's Free Labor Bureau the Best Immediate Help

By Rev. Dr. David James Burrell, Marble Collegiate Church, New York

THE cause of much of the present destitution in New York City is the industrial heresy known as the "Closed Shop." The solution of the problem lies ultimately in the vindication of the right of every man to work. As to immediate relief, it is best given through such instrumentalities as the Free Labor Bureau of the Bowery Mission, and like institutions. The Church should, as a matter of course, look after its own poor; all others should be provided for, somehow, by the city.

President of the New York Y. M. C. A. Says, Help the Willing First

By Wm. Fellowes Morgan, Esq.

NEW YORK CITY is a great attraction to thousands of young men all over the country, and the fact that there are many thousands here now out of employment is in itself sufficient reason that some action should be taken to relieve them. Whether by the city as a corporation, by private agencies, or by joint action of the city and private charitable institutions, matters little; it is the method of settlement that is of utmost importance.

With the demand from the country districts for men to work on farms and in other kinds of labor, with increasing demand of employers for good men in the cities, it should not be, and it is not, a difficult matter to place a man that can, and really wants to work. The problem today is to get the right kind of men rather than places.

The danger of helping a man who is floating around the country taking advantage of religious and philanthropic institutions, is quite obvious, and the reason that such conditions are now confronting us is that hitherto but too little real investigation has been made, and that there is a great lack of co-operation upon the part of the several agencies that are trying to help men.

A man who will not work should not be helped, and in order to discover whether a man is really in earnest, the material help should be continued only as long as it is necessary to conduct examination.

It is, therefore, of the utmost importance, that a system of co-operation be secured by means of which the deserving men may be discovered and helped. Our system of practical philanthropy is imperfect, and any attempt to remedy conditions must result in hardships to some.

I believe that the most important thing

The Charitably Disposed Should Help Tide Over the Emergency

By Jas. E. Dougherty, Commr. of Public Charity, N. Y.

IT is a subject of deep concern to every one who has a heart and sympathy for his fellow creatures. One great handicap now in our city is the season of the year: winter—and the consequent tying up of many avenues of employment.

In my judgment, all that can be done is for the charitably disposed to help tide over the pressing wants of the poor; and the deserving, willing worker will hunt up employment as soon as there is a demand for it. Our Municipal Lodging House will co-operate with any Labor Bureau, to secure work for the unemployed; but as I before said, at this season of the year but little can be done but give temporary relief.

What the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau is Doing

By Supt. John G. Hallimond

THE Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau has been organized only since the beginning of this month, but many facts of a most interesting nature have already come to light. At our Registration Meetings, held in the Mission every afternoon and evening, large crowds of men have been in attendance, and, one by one, they have been carefully examined, their names and particulars taken, and classified.

It has been our business to bring two parties—the help-hunting employer and the work-seeking man—together; and through the generosity of The Christian Herald in offering to pay transportation charges within a radius of fifty miles of New York City, we have been able to place many men.

Letters that reach us from employers make good reports of the men we have already sent out.

Up to date the following is a summary of our registrations:

Laborers	63	Machinists	9
Farm hands	70	Shoemakers	2
Porters	22	Paper box-makers	2
Stewards and cooks	16	Glassblower	1
Watchmen	6	Watchmaker	1
Firemen	11	Butchers	2
Clerks and packers	10	Tinsmiths	4
Bookkeepers	2	Salesmen	3
Carpenters	7	Pipefitters	2
Painters and paperhangers	7	Stonecutter	1
Engineers	3	Electrician	1
Teamsters	22	Cooper	1
Printers	6	Hospital nurse	1
Moulders	6	Harnessmakers	2
Ironworkers	11	Miner	1
Elevator runners	2	Tailor	1
Janitors	4	Plasterer	1
Sailors	4	Waiter	1
Useful men	17	Total	325

The newly-arrived immigrant we scarcely ever see. Our crowds are largely composed of Irishmen, Scotchmen, Englishmen, Germans, Swedes, and native-born Americans.

The following is a summary of the men sent out since the opening of the Bureau:

Machinists	3	Woodcutters	5
Farm hands	19	Salesman	1
Coachman	1	Teamsters	2
Janitor	1	Useful men	4
Firemen	5	Watchmaker	1
Laborers	9	Office man	1
Switchmen	2
Clerk	1	Total	55

I am glad to say that many of the readers of The Christian Herald needing help, have shown their appreciation of the offer of the proprietor to pay transportation to a distance of fifty miles from the city, by sending the balance of the fare when they have been beyond the limit. In some cases we have received transportation fees for several hundred miles.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. J. H. B., California. "I wish to add my testimony in the 'Answered Prayer' column, of God's power and willingness in answering our petitions. I think when our prayers are not answered as we expect, that we want our way, instead of saying, 'Thy will be done.'"

J. D. A., North Carolina. "I praise the good Lord for his answers to my prayers. I prayed earnestly to the good Lord to remove a dark cloud. For this and many other answers to my prayers I praise his holy name."

A Devoted Reader of The Christian Herald. "I always open first to the 'Answered Prayers' and devour its contents, thinking I shall find some one say that a prayer like mine is answered. My prayer is for a dear, kind husband to come to Christ and be saved. I want everyone that reads this to make a special prayer for my dear husband to be saved now, before it is too late. I have prayed daily for Mrs. J. Z. (Pennsylvania), that her son may be led in the path of right and not to go astray, and I want her to do the same for my husband. God have mercy on us all."

A Reader, Kansas. "Ever since childhood I have had much faith in prayer, and have taken my troubles to the Lord. Lately I have been praying for a blessing which he has granted: he also granted another with it for which I had not asked. I believe he always listens when we pray to him in faith."

Mrs. H. C. T., Mason, Ga. "I was threatened with a calamity which nothing but a divine power could avert. I prayed for deliverance if it was God's will. He answered my prayer, and I praise his holy name."

Mrs. N. S., Missouri. "I thank God for the privilege of reading the 'Answered Prayers.' How many times I have proved his precious promises, and I feel his grace is sufficient for every trial, if we fully trust him."

Subscriber, Pa. "God has most graciously granted my requests, and if I should neglect to acknowledge it, I should consider myself an ingrate. I earnestly entreat you to join in my prayer for a blessing."

A subscriber, N. Y. "God has not always answered in the way I asked, but in his own good time and way, and I can see now how much better was his way than mine."

A Reader, Scottsburg, N. Y. "I have had many direct answers to prayer, and I know that however small our petitions may be, if we take them to God in trustful prayer, he will never fail us."

G. A. V., Selkirk. "I also can testify to the assurance of answered prayer; its effect in calming the troubled mind and causing our doubts to disappear, renewing faith in the promises which our Lord and Saviour has given in the scriptures."

F. H. R., Georgia. "I wish to make known to others how God heard and answered my prayers."

New Sharon, Iowa. "Many times out of the depths I have called, and God has heard and answered."

M. A. M., South Dakota. "I want to acknowledge God's great goodness to me in answering prayers. I am eighty-two, almost; but when in want of a little more strength I know where to go in time of trouble."

A Mother and Reader from Maryland. "The Lord has been very gracious to me in answering my many prayers for myself and others, and I want the readers of The Christian Herald to know that it is always safe to trust God and ask his help and have faith in his word."

J. R. S., Du Quain, Ill. "I desire to acknowledge the goodness and mercy of God in answering our prayers."

A Constant Reader, Mass. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me and my family."

Mrs. A. C., Ark. "I was in heavy trouble. I asked my Father to help me, and the burden was lifted the next morning. Prayer is certainly a telephone to heaven."

Mrs. A. F. S. "Wishes to add her testimony to others, and thank the Lord for many answered prayers."

Mrs. O. C. C., Ills. "I wish to acknowledge the many times the Lord has answered and helped when I asked him."

Margaret J. J., Pennsylvania. "I was early taught the duty and privilege of prayer, and it has been my life custom to carry everything to God in prayer. And I know that he fulfils his promise, 'Ask in faith, nothing doubting, and ye shall receive.'"

A Troubled Wife and Mother. "Will you all unite with me in prayers, that my many prayers for my husband and son may be answered. That each of our hearts may be drawn to God, and that grace may be given us to trust in and love Christ."

"Standard of Highest Merit."

A CHURCH In the Wildwood

FEW people have a first-hand knowledge of that little system of churches scattered here and there in the forest of the Adirondacks. Few outside of the inhabitants of the great woods know what pretty little buildings they are, and how dearly prized. Here is one. Storm, sleet, snow, temperature, all seem to have little to do with attendance. It is an object lesson to many a city church.

The flakes of snow settle down one by one upon each other through all the winter till they have risen above vines and shrubbery, and the fir trees, bowed by their weight into humble submission, have with all nature succumbed, and wait silently for the coming of spring to set them once more free; but the little village church in the mountains is ever busy. Its lights shine forth through the trees, and its music, quite dim and muffled without, but spirited within, reveals a life which goes triumphantly on undisturbed by the severity of the elements or the intensity of winter.

This little church at Wanakena is but a single year old, and the only place of worship among four or five hundred mill hands, clerks, lumbermen, mechanics, carpenters, and people of every kind necessary to make up a tiny world far off by itself in the wilderness. There all denominations giving up prejudice, united under one form of worship, esteeming themselves Christians first, and of denominational preference afterward. The religious atmosphere, therefore, is as free from taint of dogma as the clear mountain air from contentious germ life, and as invigorating and bracing to spirituality.

None of the churches in this group has quite as encouraging an outlook as this at Wanakena, which, in a few years, may become almost entirely independent; but situated in more remote mountain districts, where there is poverty and ignorance and nothing to uplift save the wild beauty and purity of nature, or a little log schoolhouse, are churches which need outside help and cannot be sustained without it. Someone would render a lasting service to God and a needy people by placing this system of churches, now supported by offerings and subscriptions, both of which are uncertain, upon an endowment basis. There may be someone whom God has blessed with means looking earnestly and prayerfully for a specific object in which he might invest a certain sum of money where it will prove of most worth. Such a person may sooner or later be led to supply this need in the Adirondacks. ROBERT S. WIGHTMAN.

Wanakena, N.Y.

A Little Hero

In a recent article, Commander Booth-Tucker of the Salvation Army, relates the following incident, which happened at one of their Christmas dinners: "The pathos of such gatherings can easily be imagined. At the Grand Central Palace, New York City, last Christmas Day, a bright-faced little lad attracted our attention. He had come to receive a basket for his family. He seemed a manly little fellow, and waited without a murmur, holding fast to his precious ticket. There were five other children in the family, he said, all younger than he, and he was twelve. Father had had his foot injured six weeks before by molten lead being spilled on it. Work was none too plentiful, but now he was unable to do it if it was to be had. Mother couldn't work, either. She had been laid up for some time with rheumatism.

"'Dear me, that is bad,' sympathized somebody. 'Who then looks after the family?'

"'I takes care of the family, ma'am,' he answered brightly, 'I does the housework, washes the children, and looks after things.'

"'You're a brick!' declared the one addressed. But, as a sudden thought struck her, 'Who will cook the dinner for you to-day?' she asked.

THROW AWAY THE BOX OF POWDER

Do not clog up the poor baby's skin with a substance which may seem to temporarily relieve, but which—any way you look at it—is grit and cannot be dissolved. It will stay where you put it, only to cake and irritate before long. The finer powder you use, the more it gets into the pores.

You will never use powder again if you bathe the baby with and gently apply just a touch of SPIM Ointment, which is absorbed; soothes instantly; cannot injure. It's as good for you as for your baby. Eczema and all skin irritations yield to its wonderful curative properties at once. If your skin is troubled in any way, one trial will suffice to prove its power to heal. Use it sparingly—a little goes a long way and works wonders.

THE WIDENER HOME FOR CRIPPLED CHILDREN

Mr. Widener's Gift to the Children

A SPACIOUS building has just been erected in Philadelphia by Mr. P. A. B. Widener, and will shortly be opened as a Home for Crippled Children. The Home will provide a haven for little sufferers between the ages of six or seven and sixteen, giving them medical and surgical attention, and supplementing this treatment with a business and industrial education, so that they may be self supporting after their discharge. Both boys and girls will be received. As soon as a child has learned a trade, he will be paid wages for his work and will then begin to be self-supporting, a certain amount being deducted from earnings for board, thus stimulating self-respect. The trades taught will all be suitable to the powers of the children, including truck-farming, market-gardening, poultry-raising and the culture of flowers.

The Home will be under the general direction of a House-Mother, with assistant matrons for small children, so that the serious trouble encountered in many charitable institutions for children—that of the drooping and failing of the little ones owing to the lack of personal "mothering" will be avoided, each small group of children being provided with a matron or "mother."

The group of buildings comprising the Widener Home for Crippled Children is about 400 feet square, the main building being 265 feet long by 90 feet wide, with subsidiary buildings on the north and south. In the basement is a kitchen 26 feet by 58, equipped with all the conveniences of a modern hotel outfit. At the other end of the basement is a gymnasium 25 by 60 feet, dressing-rooms, bath-rooms and well lighted winter play-rooms. At the southern end of the first floor of the main building is the medical ward and solarium. At the other end are the school assembly rooms. In the centre are the main hall and staircases, surgeon's room, reception room, diet kitchen, drug store, laboratory, and two private wards. The subsidiary buildings at either end include the Industrial Building, Educational Building and cottages for dormitories. All the buildings are connected, so that the children will not be exposed to the weather. The entire site of the buildings covers thirty-five acres.

God's Building

OF all the beautiful lessons
With which God's book is filled,
This one, of wonderful sweetness,
Hath oft my being thrilled.
Oh, wonderful care of the Father!
Oh, wonderful love so free!
To know that the Maker of all things
Careth so much for me!

'Tis said that the temple, so stately,
That crowned Moriah's hill,
Was built without sound of hammer,
The toilers working so still.
Far off from the grand foundation
Was all the noise and strain
Of fitting one stone to another,
From base to turret's fane.

And when all were brought together,
The stones of every size,
The columns, so strong and graceful,
Each in its place to rise—
They formed so grand a temple
As never before was seen;
So true in its great proportions,
So bright in its glittering sheen.

Yet there is a greater temple,
And God is he who plans;
Now gath'ring his stones together
For his "house not made with hands,"
And each ransomed soul will be there,
Which evermore, day by day,
He's fitting for this great temple,
Which will last for ever and aye.

Our pains, temptations and perils,
Our sufferings, sighs and tears,
Are God's chisels, tools and hammers,
Before "the angel appears."
Let no one shrink from the process,
Let none of the Lord complain;
But wait with a meek submission,
'Twill not be long or in vain.

Away from the noise of the furnace,
Away from the toil and sin,
Will he carry each of his children,
The beautiful gates within;
Where each in appointed station
He will fashion one by one,
And Christ will complete the temple,
Himself for the corner-stone.

How Japan Treats its Criminals

IMAGINE a park or garden in the Japanese style (says a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette), with dwarf trees, surrounded by a hedge instead of a wall, in this park a group of Japanese houses, like those occupied by the peasants. The prisoners are all at work proportioned to their physical ability. Some are threshing and grinding rice; others are weaving coarse cloth of a dark red color, of which the prison uniforms are made; the old and infirm are separating leaves of paper. All of them receive a percentage of their earnings. The younger prisoners are in school. The discipline is military in form, but in its spirit reformatory.

There are few evasions, notwithstanding the ease with which they could be effected. One reason for this is the efficiency of the Japanese police, which is said to be the best in the world. The prisoners are divided into three grades, and are differently fed, according as they are idle and refractory, amenable to discipline, or exceptionally well behaved. The only other punishment is solitary confinement in a sort of dungeon, not exceeding five days. No prisoner may be discharged, however short his term of sentence, unless his family or friends assume responsibility for him. The result has been the organization of a large number of prisoners' aid societies.

Gospel Progress in Guam

YOUR letter, with money enclosure, reached me in the island of Guam, just as I was leaving for America, having been compelled to leave the mission for a period on account of serious illness. I especially desire to thank you for your gift. It has been largely applied toward paying the expense of translating the New Testament into the Chamorro language.

Although the Spanish have been in Guam over 300 years, and the Roman Church has had complete control of the people throughout this entire period, not even portions of the Scriptures have been translated into the language of the people, and the only printed matter given to them consists of a very small devotionary to St. Francis—patron saint of one of the islands—and a small catechism. Very few of the people can read Spanish intelligently, although many can pronounce it. You will therefore see the necessity of translating the Bible into their tongue.

Our work is in a fairly good condition. We have a church organized, with thirty-three regular members and thirty-one probationers, and good schools. The Governor has recently written very favorably of our evangelical schools, which he had just visited. The public schools have just been reopened, employing both American and native teachers. Of the seven teachers in Agana, three were taken from our schools, although the Protestant population has less than 150 of the 10,000 people on the island. Nearly one-fourth of the natives employed by the Governor in good positions are Protestants.

During our absence, the work has been carried on by the natives themselves, under the direction of Mr. T. H. Sanderson, Paymaster, and Mr. Elmer Gay, clerk in the Paymaster's Department of the U. S. Navy. Rev. Herbert E. B. Case and wife, of Pawtucket, R. I., have just left San Francisco for Guam to take up the work there.

MRS. H. E. B. CASE

T. H. SANDERSON

REV. H. E. B. CASE

The Protestant people are conspicuous for their morality and intelligence, and Protestantism will undoubtedly have a dominating influence in the affairs of the island. Although the progress of the work has not been startling, yet we believe that the blessing and approval of God has been upon it from the beginning. The future is bright with promise.

I am now engaged in preparing a New Testament in Chamorro for publication, which I hope to be able to have printed early next year.

F. M. PRICE, Missionary.

Mr. Case was born in Pawtucket, R. I., in 1877, and is a member of the First Congregational Church of that city, which has assumed his support. He has been a Student Volunteer for some years, having felt the force of the missionary motive ever since he was fifteen years of age. Mrs. Case is also from Pawtucket, being a member of the Park Place Congregational Church of that city. She was graduated from Brown University in 1902, and has for a long time been known in the church with which she is connected as specially interested in missionary work.

The Czar's New Minister

OSTENSIBLY, the resignation of Prince Sviatopolk-Mirsky from the Ministry of the Interior (says the New York Sun), and the transfer of that office to M. Witte, already President of the Council, is a triumph for the Reactionists, for it is known that M. Witte opposed the granting of the petition of the Zemstvos for representative government. What M. Witte's ultimate intentions as regards constitutional reform are, it is as yet impossible to say, though it may well be that he has determined that, if Russia is to have a Constitution, his name shall be linked with it in history. He is an implacable enemy of corruption. So long as he is master, there will be no more shameful embezzlement in the ordnance department, in the quartermaster's department, in the medical department, and in the commissariat of the army and the navy. Every Russian soldier and Russian seaman will get what is coming to him. A great wave of hope and confidence will sweep over the Empire when the Czar's subjects learn that, at last, they have the one thing that makes autocracy endurable—a strong man and an honest man at the helm. For the friends of peace there could be no better augury than the elevation of M. Witte to virtual omnipotence, so far as Russia is concerned. He firmly opposed the war, not only on financial grounds, but because he was thoroughly alive to the relative preparedness of the Japanese. The Jews will breathe again when they hear of M. Witte's promotion. Alone among the Czar's advisers, he had the courage to denounce the Kishineff massacre to De Plehve's face, and to warn his master that religious persecution must cease, if Russia was ever to be prosperous and tranquil.

Singing Hymns in Prison

At the Sabbath morning and Tuesday evening services among the prisoners in Raymond Street jail, Brooklyn, the chaplain gives the men the privilege of selecting some of the hymns. Among those frequently sung was "Jesus is tenderly calling thee home." This particular hymn they sang with spirit and feeling that might be envied by many a congregation. So popular has it become, that the prisoners often meet the chaplain before the services, and ask that the hymn may be chosen, while others, who are not permitted to attend service, send word to have it sung. What may seem strangest of all is, that often through the day, when the men are walking about, one can hear them singing the hymn softly, the words being caught up by those in their cells. Again, you can hear some of them whistling it.

One day a prisoner came to the chaplain and said. "I want to tell you something. I have been here a number of times, but I have never heard anything like this before. Singing religious hymns when the men are walking about, exercising. I don't think the hymn is sung lightly, either, but just as you sing it in the services. Many a dark cloud is lifted, and many a ray of sunshine comes into our darkened cells and lives by the singing of these Gospel hymns."

A young prisoner one day said to me, "Chaplain, you know where my cell is." "Yes," I replied. "Well, I want to tell you that cell is my Bethel, for I not only read my Bible and pray several times a day to the good God, but he has answered my prayers and blessed me in many ways, and I praise him that my eyes have been opened, and through this experience I have seen that there is a better way to live. The messages you have brought to us here at our cell doors, have so helped us that many a man goes out from here better than when he came in."

K. C. BOWEN, Chaplain.

A FELLOW FEELING

Why She Felt Lenient Towards the Drunkard

A great deal depends on the point of view. A good temperence woman was led, in a very peculiar way, to revise her somewhat harsh judgment of the poor fellow who cannot resist his cups, and she is now the more charitable. She writes:

"For many years I was a great sufferer from asthma. Finally my health got so poor that I found I could not lie down, but walked the floor whilst others slept. I got so nervous I could not rest anywhere.

"Specialists told me I must give up the use of coffee—the main thing that I always thought gave me some relief. I consulted our family physician, and he, being a coffee fiend himself, told me to pay no attention to their advice. Coffee had such a charm for me that in passing a restaurant and getting a whiff of the fragrance, I could not resist a cup. I felt very lenient towards the drunkard who could not pass the saloon. Friends often urged me to try Postum, but I turned a deaf ear, saying 'That may do for people to whom coffee is harmful, but not for me—coffee and I will never part.'

"At last, however, I bought a package of Postum, although I was sure I could not drink it. I prepared it as directed, and served it for breakfast. Well, bitter as I was against it, I must say that never before had I tasted a more delicious cup of coffee! From that day to this (more than 2 years), I have never had a desire for the old coffee. My health soon returned; the asthma disappeared, I began to sleep well and in a short time I gained 20 pounds in weight.

"One day I handed my physician the tablets he had prescribed for me, telling him I had no use for them. He stayed for dinner. When I passed him his coffee cup he remarked, 'I am glad to see you were sensible enough not to let yourself be persuaded that coffee was harmful. This is the best cup of coffee I ever drank,' he continued; 'the trouble is so few people know how to make good coffee.' When he got his second cup I told him he was drinking Postum. He was incredulous, but I convinced him, and now he uses nothing but Postum in his home and has greatly improved in health," Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The Revolution in Russia

The People's Petition Answered by a Shower of Bullets and a Cossack Charge—A Sunday Massacre

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND Russian workmen assembled to petition the Emperor on Sunday, January 22. They were peaceful and practically unarmed. They were divided up into companies, and the main body was led by a priest, who carried in one hand the Czar's portrait and in the other an ikon, or sacred image. Singing and hopeful, they advanced. The priest, Father Gapon, would present to their "Little Father," the Czar, the petition of his people. Many wives and children marched with the workers.

But the Czar was in hiding—invisible, no one knew where. The Grand Dukes and all the princes were also invisible. Cossacks with gleaming sabres lined the streets; cannon were mounted everywhere, and martial law prevailed. 50,000 soldiers held every artery of the capital.

At daybreak, guard regiments, cavalry, and infantry held all the bridges across the frozen Neva, the network of canals which interlace the city, and the gates leading from the industrial section, while in the Palace Square, as the storm centre, were massed dragoon regiments, infantry, and Cossacks of the Guards. As the procession marched, it was joined by thousands from different parts of the city, all hurrying to the Palace Square, where they were in hopes of seeing the Emperor and presenting their petition. As they approached the great square, in front of the Winter Palace, they found every point occupied by Cossacks and artillery.

As the head of the procession approached the military line, which was held by the Ismailovsky (a regiment of which the Czar is honorary colonel), Father Gapon, still holding the crucifix, advanced and demanded that the colonel receive and forward the petition. This request was declined. Then, after a minute's hesitation and discussion, the procession continued to advance. A sharp order was given. The soldiers raised their rifles, and a volley rang out, but only blank cartridges. A second order: this time ball cartridge was used, and men, women and children fell in heaps; other women turned to flee, and were shot in the back as they fled. Father Gapon, still grasping his crucifix, stood among the dead and dying with the petition. Another volley followed and the crowd turned and fled, leaving 300 dead and 500 wounded. Some who had revolvers fired as they fled. Others carried icepicks, some had stones, but practically all were unarmed.

After the second volley by the troops, and when the crowd roared with fury on seeing their friends fall dying and wounded, the Cossacks drew their swords and began slashing right and left. Some of the Cossacks were dragged to the ground by the infuriated crowd. Soon the snowy square was dyed blood-red, and the heaps of dead and mangled lay around. The place looked like a shambles. It was 2:30 o'clock before the square was finally cleared.

In Admiralty Square, the Cossacks charged the crowds (which had been singing "the Marseillaise"), and a battalion of infantry fired ball cartridge into the thickest part of the mass of people. Everywhere the people cried out to the troops to throw down their weapons and not fire on workingmen.

Meanwhile, similar tragic scenes were being enacted in other parts of the city. Every demonstration by the populace found its progress barred, and where it persisted, it was mowed down by cruel volleys from the troops. Twenty thousand people started from Kolpino, a manufacturing village twenty-five miles away. At the Moscow arch, on the confines of the town, they met with six volleys. A thousand fell dead and 1,500 were wounded. From up the river a great crowd marched to the Nevsky gate, where 500 fell dead and 700 were wounded.

It was midnight before the firing in the city had ceased, and even then the troops were meeting with resistance on Vassili Island. The leaders of the masses met late Sunday evening and determined to continue the struggle with arms.

No one knows how many lives were sacrificed in the street fighting, which was in reality a massacre. One estimate puts the dead at 2,100, and the wounded at 5,000. The authorities declare that the number was much smaller.

Curiosity paid a heavy penalty, for the last act of the sanguinary drama was the deliberate cutting down of several hundred spectators, who had in no way contributed to the disturbances. A large force of Cossacks was ordered to clear the streets leading to the Winter Palace (this was after the strikers had been shot down and dispersed), and they proceeded to attack mercilessly the crowds on the sidewalks, shooting and cutting them down with their sabres. The Cossacks charged like a hurricane. Even those who ran away, were shot with carbines and rifles. This inexcusable atrocity raised the feelings in the capital to a high pitch, and the excited crowds were ready for anything. Everywhere in the streets one could hear loud accusations against the authorities. There seemed to be a general conviction that the whole outcome of the bloody Sunday's work was coldly and deliberatelv planned by Russia's rulers.

Many dramatic incidents of the fighting are related. A crowd surrounded an old man in a General's uniform. This was shortly after the first murderous fusilade, and the people were mad with passion. They tore the old General from his carriage and killed him on the spot.

Neither the Czar nor any of his ministers put in an appearance. It was reported that Nicholas had gone to his place at Tsarskoe Selo, on the Gulf of Finland, and again it was said that he had not really left the capital, but was hidden away in the Anitchkoff Palace, where his mother, the Dowager Empress lives. Whether he was there or at the Winter Palace during the fighting on Sunday, no one seems to know. All day long, a regiment of Cossacks guarded the Anitchkoff Palace, where the Dowager Empress remained. On Saturday she had driven twice the entire length of the Nevski Prospekt in an open sleigh, to show an example of courage to her timid and irresolute son, the Czar, who did not dare to face the crisis.

Father Gapon, the leader of the masses is a young, mild-looking, fair-haired, blue-eyed priest, quiet in demeanor, but of fiery eloquence when speaking to the people. He was unhurt during the shooting. At a meeting late on Sunday night, a letter from Father Gapon was read, in which he addressed the Russian workingmen as his comrades, and said, "There is no Czar. Between him and the Russian nation torrents of blood have flowed to-day. It is high time the Russian workmen begin without him to carry on their struggle for national freedom. For the fight to-morrow, I will be among you."

The strikers began early Monday morning barricading the streets anew. The Chief of Police was found among the slain on Sunday. Many of the soldiers shot their own officers when ordered to fire on the people.

On the day following the riot and massacre, the city was still greatly agitated. Troops from all parts of the country were being rushed to strengthen the military defenders of the Czar and his tottering government. At the same time vast numbers of workmen from many quarters were setting their faces in the same direction, to join their brothers in the great struggle for human rights and a constitutional government.

There is a likelihood that the revolutionary movement will spread to Finland, where a general rising is expected among the factory employees. It is also learned that the Circassians have revolted, and killed hundreds of the Russian guards in the Caucasus. Tiflis, where the Russians have taken refuge, is beleaguered by the rebels. The Armenians in Russia also threaten to rise, and it is said that an armed force of Armenians has joined the rebels in the attack on Tiflis.

As to the revolutions in St. Petersburg and Russia proper, it is said that as soon as the signal is given for a general rising, rifled cannon, smaller weapons and a great quantity of ammunition are in readiness to be conveyed across the border.

When Baby Died

He nestled near my heart, and then
I knew the love of coming men.
He left me; and my heart grew cold
With grief and anguish all untold,
Burning the tears I could not shed,
I could not look upon his bed;
He was my hope, my joy, my pride—
The sun grew dark when Baby died.

For years, I could not see just why,
So much of love and life should die,
But now I know, God's way was best;
I look beyond my empty nest,
And from my heart's keen pain, can bring
The love for every living thing.
He has a saner, sweeter side,
For others, since my Baby died.

A Valuable Reference

I received the copy of the Crown Dictionary, and it supplies a long-felt need. I find Webster's Unabridged very cumbersome every time I wish to ascertain the exact meaning or pronunciation of a word; this is so convenient to have by me when reading. I shall take great pleasure in showing it to my friends. I have been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and should miss its weekly visits above measure. I am an invalid, and it keeps me in touch with what is being done for our Saviour in all parts of the world.

Christ a Servant*

ALL life is a service. The most independent man, howsoever wealthy he may be, is really in some aspects of his life, a servant. If he devotes himself to pleasure, there are obligations he must fulfil in order to keep himself in the ranks. If he devotes himself to money-making, he has to keep appointments and to work for remuneration, which, though he may disguise the fact to himself, is really wages for work done. The highest office in the country is a service; the best President is he who regards himself as the servant of the State. Ministers of the Gospel, though teachers, may say with the apostle, "Ourselves your servants for Christ's sake." Stations differ, authorities differ, the compensation differs in kind and degree, but every man is a servant in some capacity.

All fame and honor are the reward of service. The world honors him most who serves it best. The names it never forgets are not those of the highest rank, but those who have been able to render it some signal service. Warriors who have fought its battles, inventors who have contributed to its comfort or profit, authors who have given it pleasure or information, physicians who have alleviated its pain, artists whose works have given it delight—these are the men who are remembered. He who desires an immortality of fame must render service.

Christ said, "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." It was no mere saying. His whole life was a service; he took upon him the form of a servant. In the last solemn hours of his life he took a towel and girded himself, and, taking water, he went from one wondering disciple to another, doing a servant's work. They could not understand it then; but the lesson must have gone deep into their hearts. The Son of man, he told them, came not to be ministered unto but to minister. He was showing them, by his own example, how dignified, how noble, service is. The idea was new to the world, but it has entered into the spirit of the religion he founded. The missionary toiling in heathen lands that others may know the truth; the women in the hospitals doing the most repulsive work; the worker among the poor, striving to help them bear their burdens and infusing light and pleasure into their dull lives; these are following Him in his work on the earth. Self-sacrifice, self-denial, are the watchwords of his true followers.

Opportunities of service are nearer to us and more numerous than we realize. "Some time ago," says a well-known minister, "I missed a young woman from our service, and I took occasion to ask why she was not coming. 'Did you notice Mrs. So-and-So there?' she asked. 'Yes,' I said, 'I saw her there.' 'Well,' she said, 'I went to take care of her children so that she could come.' 'Capital,' I said, 'I am glad you were not at the service.'"

The late Dr. Taylor used to tell a story in point, of his grandfather, a miller in Scotland. He was taking a bag of meal to a farmer on the other side of the mountain, and had slung it across the back of his pony. The animal stumbled, and the bag slipped off. The miller struggled to replace it, but could not. He waited some time, hoping some one would come by who would help him. Presently he saw a man approaching, but when he came nearer, he saw it was the great Laird of the county. He could not think of asking help from so distinguished a man. But the Laird, seeing his predicament, alighted from his horse, and helped the miller to replace the sack. The miller was profuse in his thanks. "Say no more," said the Laird, "the way to repay me is, if you ever see a man needing help as badly as you did just now, that you help him."

A Test of Faith

By MRS. M. BAXTER

AN impression had been made upon some of the Galileans who had seen Jesus in Jerusalem at the Feast of the Passover—the first Passover during the time of his ministry. Probably some of them were acquainted with a nobleman, a courtier, who resided at Capernaum, and whose son was dangerously ill. Most likely all human aid had been tried in vain, and the father was ready to accept any suggestion which might lead to the cure of his beloved son. Doubtless, he had heard of many who had been healed through this new Prophet who had arisen; and with only one thing in mind—how to get his son cured—he came to the Lord in Cana, some few miles away from Capernaum, and besought him that he would come down and heal his son, for he was at the point of death.

It must have cost this father something to leave his son; but he felt the need to be so great that he could trust no one else to go quickly enough; and when he saw that Jesus was in no hurry, and began to talk to him about believing, he grew impatient, and said: "Sir, come down ere my child die." He did not see that the words of Jesus, which seemed to him a cruel waste of time, were really expediting the very object which was in his heart. If Jesus could heal, why did he not come at once? Was it not an honor that Jesus, a simply-clad man, should be called to the house of such a distinguished man as he was? But what was it which Jesus said to him? "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe. Except ye see, ye will not believe." This is what hinders the salvation, sanctification, or healing of many. They want to see, they want to feel, they want something which satisfies them, not understanding that the great necessity is that they should satisfy God.

The works that he did were witnesses to his Godhead. He must so heal this son that the father might believe that he was the Son of God. Had he gone down with the father to Capernaum, and laid his hand upon the child, the nobleman would have considered indeed that he was a prophet, and there it would have stopped. But the Lord was working out a greater thing. He put his faith to a test when he said to him: "Thy son liveth." And the man stood the test; "he believed the word which Jesus had spoken unto him, and he went his way." No need for haste now. He could easily have returned home that afternoon, for the seventh hour is but our one o'clock. But it would seem that the faith of this man in the word of Jesus had been so great that he only returned home on the morrow. A great change had taken place at home—life and health had taken the place of disease and threatened death, joy and gladness of anxiety and mourning; and the nobleman's servants were sent, after the invalid had passed a good night in healthy sleep, to bring good tidings to the father.

"Thy son liveth!" The very words of Jesus were repeated by the servants. "When did this change take place?" was the eager question. "Yesterday, about the seventh hour, the fever left him." What! the very hour when the Great Prophet said to me, "Thy son liveth!" Who can this be? He is the Messiah. The works which Jesus did had borne witness of him; his Father was glorified; witness was borne to his divine power; the nobleman and his household became believers in Jesus, and the son was healed; not only one body, but many souls—this was God's greater plan.

Whenever a child of God is sick, others are concerned besides himself. He is part of a body, the body of Christ. He owes much to God, as being his child; he owes—oh, how much!—to him who bore his sins and his sicknesses. If he is truly at God's disposal, he will desire above all things to be in the will of God and to enter into his purposes.

Only God can tell us what he has to say to us when we are permitted to suffer. But never let us look at it independently of God, as though our bodies belonged to us, and we might deal with them as we would. When our Lord Jesus purchased us at a great price, he did not pay that price for a part of us; he died for every man, for the whole of every man—spirit, soul and body; and in a human body and soul which was in the beginning with God, he pleads our cause before the throne.

A Whole Year for 10 Cents

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE, of St. Louis, is now the greatest Magazine in the world, having One Million Five Hundred Thousand (1,500,000) subscribers, almost double the number of subscribers any other magazine or newspaper in the world has. Each issue is filled with splendid stories, beautiful engravings, special departments of Floriculture, Fancy-work, Fashions, Household, Health and Beauty, Poultry, Garden, etc.

There is a reason why THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE has more than double the number of subscribers that any other publication in the world has: if a reader of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE wishes to know anything about the latest styles, THAT month's issue gives them; if some bug is destroying her plants, THAT month's issue tells her what it is and how to get rid of it; if fruits are to be preserved, THAT month's issue tells all about them. THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE always tells its readers what they want to know at the right time. From 96 to 138 columns each issue of splendid pictures, interesting stories, useful information: Flowers, the Garden, Lace Making, Embroidery (with new and beautiful patterns each month that any woman can make), Cooking Recipes, Fashions, Poultry, Pets, Household Decoration, Pyrography, Curious Facts, Health and Beauty columns: each issue supplies reading for the whole family.

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE never permits misleading advertisements to appear in its columns and absolutely protects its readers so that they are not defrauded by catch-penny schemes. No whiskey or nasty medical ads. are ever seen in the columns of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE. It is clean, wholesome and bright. A single issue is worth more than the whole year's subscription. We wish every home in America to receive THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE and in order that it may go into your home, we will send you THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE and if you do not like it after you have received it for three months, we will return your 10 cents and stop sending it. You will have had it three months for nothing. This shows very plainly that we know you will be pleased with THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE. You will never be willing to discontinue it. In fact, we know you will be so delighted you will also get your friends to subscribe. No other magazine gives as much for five times the price we ask you.

Do not confuse THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE of St. Louis with the cheap, poorly printed and trashy story papers. THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE is printed on fine paper, carefully edited and beautifully illustrated and is better than most Magazines sold for ten times the price at which we offer it to you. Our offer to refund your money if you do not like it after three months' trial is a guarantee that no other magazine ever dared to make.

Tens of Thousands of Our Readers Visited Our Great Building This Year.

Tens of thousands of women visited our great building this year. It is the most beautiful building in this country and the finest publishing plant in the world, and was built for cash at a cost of over half a million dollars, exclusively for the publication of

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE

During the World's Fair, tens of thousands of our readers were taken care of by THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE, in the great tent city "Camp Lewis," erected for our readers at a cost of over $30,000. The readers of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE know that every month they can expect some new and interesting feature.

The readers of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE always know how to do things; their gardens and houses are the wonder of their neighbors, because it contains plain, easily understood articles, telling more good things about Flowers and the Garden than regular Floral Papers and are always seasonable. More good things about Fancy Work and Embroidery, with illustrated patterns, than Fashion Papers. More good things about Poultry and the Garden, and how to make money with them, than Poultry Papers. More good things about the Kitchen and Household than Household Papers.

ALWAYS SEASONABLE. ALWAYS CORRECT. ALWAYS EASILY UNDERSTOOD

This is the greatest opportunity you will ever get to secure one of the finest monthly magazines published, for a whole year for 10 cents, the price usually charged for a single copy of such a paper. Do not delay, but send 10 cents for a year's subscription, stating that you are a reader of The Christian Herald. NOTICE:—If you wish to take advantage of this opportunity for your friends, you can send 10c. each for as many subscriptions as you wish. You could not make a nicer present to your friends than one which will remind them each month, of you, so pleasantly. Address

JAMIESON, FAUSSET & BROWN'S BIBLE COMMENTARY (Two Vols.)

By Robert Jamieson, D.D., St. Paul's, Glasgow; Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., St. Cuthbert's, York; and David Brown, D.D., Professor of Theology, Aberdeen.

A complete commentary—critical, explanatory and practical—on the Old and New Testaments, 1380 pages. Former Price, $9.00. The body of the work consists of notes that are concise, learned, free from verbiage and easily understood, that elucidate and explain difficult passages of Scripture, or whose import is not readily apprehended. Far in advance of the older works now in use, it is also the most practical, suggestive and scientific.

Rev. J. H. Vincent, Bishop M. E. Church: "It deserves a place on the table of every Bible student."

CRITICAL AND EXPOSITORY BIBLE CYCLOPÆDIA

By Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., joint author of the Jamieson, Fausset & Brown Bible Commentary. 750 three-column pages; 600 illustrations. Regular Price, $5.00.

This great work is the result of seven years of labor by the author, contains three thousand seven hundred articles and presents a completeness, conciseness and thoroughness such as to make it a perfect Bible Cyclopædia. It sets forth briefly and suggestively those doctrinal and experimental truths which are contained in the Written Word itself.

The late Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage: "It is in advance of all books in that line—unique, learned, accurate and valuable."

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

The celebrated Jewish Historian, translated from the Original Greek by William Whiston, A.M. 1,056 pages, nearly 100 illustrations. Former Price, $4.00.

In this great work is contained the History and Antiquities of the Jews, Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; also Dissertations concerning Jesus Christ, John the Baptist, James the Just, and the Sacrifice of Isaac.

ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE BIBLE

By Rev. John Kitto, D.D., F.S.A. It contains 735 double-column pages, 220 engravings. Former Price, $4.50.

No modern writer has contributed more largely to enrich the biblical literature of our time, or to clothe with a fresh and living interest the main personages and incidents in Bible History than John Kitto in this magnificent work. Deeply interesting and instructive, and abounding in striking pictorial illustrations, it should have a place in every home. Over 100,000 copies of this popular work have been sold.

EDERSHEIM'S LIFE AND TIMES OF JESUS THE MESSIAH

(2 Vols.) The Authorized American Edition. By Alfred Edersheim, M.A., Oxon., D.D., Lecturer Oxford University.

Former Price, $6.00. Royal 8vo, 1,524 pages, handsomely bound in silk cloth. Gives a full account of the society, life and development—intellectual and religious—in Palestine, to serve as a frame and background for the picture of Christ. The fresh study of the text of the Gospels makes the book a historical commentary on four Gospels.

The Sunday School Times recommends it: "It is positively refreshing to read a life of the Savior which is critical in the best and truest sense of the word, and is biblical at the same time."

CONCISE CYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE

Biblical, Biographical, Theological, Historical, Geographical and Practical. By Rev. E. B. Sanford, D.D., assisted by a brilliant galaxy of Biblical Scholars and Divines. 985 pages, beautifully illustrated. Regular Price, $3.50.

To the seekers after knowledge this work will prove a surprising storehouse of information regarding Church History, Bible History, Bible Names, Places, Customs, Doctrines, Creeds, Denominations, the Early Church, The Story of the Reformation, the various Young People's Societies, Theologians, Scholars, Cathedrals, Churches, etc.

Christian Endeavor World, Boston: "Knowledge is here available for which many have not known just where to turn."

SMITH'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

Edited by William Smith, LL.D., Classical Examiner of University of London. It formerly sold for $4.50.

Contains 1,024 large octave pages finely illustrated. An indispensable aid to ministers, teachers, families, Sunday School Superintendents and Bible readers generally. This is, undoubtedly, the best work of its kind in the English language.

THE LIFE AND EPISTLES OF ST. PAUL

By the Rev. W. J. Conybeare, M.A., of Cambridge, and J. S. Howson, D.D., of Liverpool. Formerly sold for $4.50.

Contains 1,014 large octavo pages, many fine illustrations, maps, charts, etc. There is no work that will compare with this in giving a life-like picture of the great apostle and the work which he did.

CRUDEN'S COMPLETE CONCORDANCE

By Alexander Cruden, M.A. Former Price, $1.50.

Contains 756 large octavo pages, clearly printed and handsomely and strongly bound in cloth. Scripture is the best interpreter of Scripture, and next to the Bible no volume is of greater value to the Bible student than Cruden's Concordance.

THREE THOUSAND SELECTED QUOTATIONS

By Josiah Gilbert. Introduction by Chas. S. Robinson, D.D. 681 pages. Former Price, $2.00

Burning words of brilliant writers from the literature of all ages, with complete index of authors and subjects. Undenominational and evangelical. Preachers, Teachers and Bible students will be charmed with these brilliant utterances, which clearly and forcibly express or apply some religious truth.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

G. D. T., Elroy, Wis. It is stated in Acts 11:26, that the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch; were there no Christians before that? Was not the baptism of John the Baptist Christian baptism?

The people of Antioch probably gave them the name in derision, and it became a name of honor, just as Methodist was first given in ridicule, and was afterwards borne with pride. The disciples were Christians before they were so called. Giving them a new name did not change their nature. They were followers of Christ, and the name, though given in derision, was so appropriate that it came into general use. John's baptism was not Christian baptism; it was preparatory to it. He was the last prophet of the old Dispensation, and the greatest, but as he preceded Christ in point of time, he could not be a Christian or a follower of Christ.

Inquirer, Davenport, Ia. Is a member of Congress or of the Legislature justified in voting according to his own judgment, when he knows that his constituents do not agree with him?

If, when he was elected, he pledged himself to vote on the question as his constituents believed, he ought to fulfil his pledge, even though against his judgment. But if he was elected without giving any pledge, he is bound to follow the dictates of his conscience and disregard the opinions of his constituents. He is not simply their mouthpiece, but must exercise the right of personal judgment. If he believes that he no longer represents them, he should resign.

The books and Calendar were received, and I am more than pleased. Forty Thousand Thoughts are without price. The Calendar is more than beautiful, admired by all. I thank you for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the premiums. JACOB H. C.
St. Louis, Mo.

L. E. C., Brooklyn, N. Y. In what sense can the coming of John the Baptist be regarded as a fulfilment of Matt. 4:15 if, as he said, he was not Elias?

He came in the spirit and power of Elijah, doing the same kind of work. That is, he came to call the people of his time to repentance. He revived the prophetic office. He did not come as a priest or a scribe, who were the recognized teachers of the people, but as a prophet, bearing the message of Elijah, with the added word that the Messiah was at hand.

Elder A. S., Lorena, Tex. 1. Does the celebrated Helen Keller give instructions? 2. How does she receive and answer questions?

1. We never heard that the young woman ever gave instructions to anyone. 2. Miss Kellar interprets what is being said to her by placing her fingers upon the lips of the speaker. She can also communicate by the sign language used by the deaf, and can read the raised alphabet. The senses of seeing, hearing, and of comprehension and speech seems to be condensed in her supersensitive fingers.

K. M., Waterloo, Ia. When was Christ born? From what period do we reckon time?

It was intended to reckon it from the birth of Christ, but Dionysius Exiguus, on whose calculations the era was based, had not at hand the materials we now have for working it out correctly. Even now we do not know for certain when Christ was born, but the best scholars are of opinion that it was in December, B. C. 5.

J. H., Everett, Wash. If one earns an income of fifty dollars a month, and one's living expenses are forty, ought the tithe to be paid on the fifty or on the balance of ten?

If the living expenses include no business charges, that is, if you have fifty dollars clear of all expenses connected with your occupation, we presume that to be consistent with your principles you should pay on that. There are some cases in which it would be impossible to tithe the whole income, and yours may be one of them. In cases of sickness in the family for example. Sometimes with the utmost care and economy, it is impossible to live so as to give a full tithe. Your own conscience must be the guide. You are not under compulsion, as the Jews were, but if your heart is in the system you will practice all the economy you can in order to fulfil your obligation.

Miss W. N., Minnesota. Please give me information regarding the Postal Savings Banks. 1. Is it a safe way to put by a part of income for a rainy day? 2. Is it backed by the Government?

1 and 2. There are no Postal Savings Banks backed by the Government in the United States. They exist in Great Britain and some other foreign countries. In most of the States, the laws are strict for the inspection of Savings Banks, but the State itself is not responsible for them. Where too high interest is not offered, they are a safe way of providing for a rainy day. The correspondent should make inquiry at home regarding the Minnesota law.

R. R. P., Salem, Ark., and J. S., Johnstown, O. How do you reconcile John 1:20, where John the Baptist says he was not Elias, with Matt. 17:10-13, where Christ says he was Elias?

John probably regarded himself not as Elias, but as coming in the spirit and power of Elijah (see Luke 1:17). Doubtless he was too modest to take the title that Jesus gave him. Jesus, however, does not appear to have considered John as Elijah, in identity, but as corresponding to him in his work.

I received the book Good Manners this week, and am very much pleased with it indeed, and I thank you for it. Mrs. Sangster I admire very much, and a book written by her is a very welcome gift. Hoping for the continued prosperity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I am, yours truly, ANNIE M. FOULDS.

J. C., Union, Neb. Can you explain Eccles 3:18-22? It appears to teach that men have no future life, as it says they have no pre-eminence over beasts.

The preacher is relating his experience in his search after truth. You will notice in the early part of the book how and why he begins his search. The passage you refer to is one stage of his inquiry. In the later parts of the book he shows how he had been mistaken, and that in faith and trust he had discovered the only means of solving the problems of life.

"Anna" writes this bit of advice to Carrie W., Green Valley, N. Y.:

If she has a good place and good stock, and can give careful attention, she could make money with poultry. I have cleared nearly two dollars a hen this last year above expenses, selling at wholesale prices. Eggs have been higher than usual, and grain has been also, part of the time. It cost me $38 to feed from twenty-four to twenty-nine hens and eighteen chickens, and I received most 4,000 eggs.

N. S., Beechmont, Ky. When did Paul go into Arabia and for what purpose? There seems some confusion between the Acts and the Epistles on the subject.

Nothing is known of this visit to Arabia beyond Paul's own statement (Gal. 1:17–18). We do not even know what region is referred to, as several were known by that name. In Acts 9:20 it is stated that "Straightway" he preached Christ in Damascus, and this following immediately the story of his conversion, would lead us to suppose that the preaching was directly afterwards. But in Acts 9:23 we come upon a suggestive statement: "After many days were fulfilled." These many days, as the chronology of Paul's life shows, were about three years. Now, if he had been preaching three years in Damascus, the disciples at Jerusalem would not have been so suspicious of him as appears from Acts 9:26. A probable explanation is, that after his conversion Paul made a public avowal of his change of heart and an explanation, which is the preaching referred to. That, being opposed by the Jews and baffled, he retired to Arabia, which was probably the desert near Damascus, to think and consider and get divine light. That after remaining there a long time in study—probably more than two years—he returned to Damascus, and preached with such power as to provoke the persecution from which he escaped in a basket. We cannot imagine the Jews of Damascus allowing so prominent a convert to do much preaching before they attacked him. This would place the retirement to Arabia between two periods of preaching in Damascus, and would harmonize the Acts and the Epistles.

Mrs. Charles S., St. Louis, Mo. How many copies are printed every week of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and on what kind of presses is it printed?

Circulation varies from 225,000 to 250,000; printed on flat-bed, perfecting and two-color presses.

Mrs. W. D. B., Warren, Mass., and other readers. The birds on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Calendar are the blue jay, scarlet tanager, robin and evening grosbeak.

Mrs. Nelson McC., Patterson, N. J. Can you tell me where I can find the poem entitled "The Absent-minded Beggar"?

The author is Rudyard Kipling. Published by Brentano, New York.

Reader, Highland Park, Tenn. Can you tell me where I can find the book entitled The Old Helmet, by the author of The Wide, Wide World?

Susan Warner was the author of these books, and they were published by a firm in New York not now in existence. We would suggest an old book-store as a likely place where they might be found. They may be in the public library in your vicinity, also.

I have received the premium, Family Worship, and it is indeed a time-saver for busy men. No searching for appropriate Scripture lessons and hymns, and no vain repetitions, while this work is used. Every Christian household should have one.
Washington, D. C. B. J. NORTHCOTT.

M. A. W., Pontiac, Ill. We are informed that there is a passage in Tacitus, which reads that a person named Christus was put to death in the reign of Tiberius, the emperor. Why is Christus supposed to be Jesus the Christ?

The passage in question is from the Annals, book 15, chapter 14. Tacitus is writing of the sect called Christians, and says, "They had their denomination from Christus, who in the reign of Tiberius was put to death as a criminal, by the procurator, Pontius Pilate." This, we think, answers the question conclusively, as it connects founder and followers, and is a positive identification. "Christus" is the Latin form of "Christ."

School Girl, Pana, Ill. Who was the old man that died of joy after ringing the Liberty Bell proclaiming Liberty?

Histories of the United States give the incident but do not mention the name of the man.

I received the Calendar, and am greatly pleased with it. I also received the two volumes of Forty Thousand Beautiful Thoughts. It's the biggest investment for the money in literature and books I ever made. If THE CHRISTIAN HERALD alone cost the price paid for all, I could not afford to be without it. H. H. SCHROP.

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

A CITY CAPTURED FOR CHRIST

Story of the Great Revival at Schenectady, N. Y., in which 19 Pastors and 8 Denominations took Part

REV. H. C. COOPER
Emmanuel Baptist Church

REV. G. F. WHITTEMORE
First Baptist Church

REV. G. R. LUNN
First Reformed Church

REV. R. J. HOGAN
Bellevue Reformed Church

DURING the first four weeks in January, there was a remarkable spiritual awakening in Schenectady, N. Y. Not only did it take a deep hold upon the city itself, so that it became the topic of conversation on the streets, in the stores, on the cars, and at social gatherings, but it was also talked about in the saloons, and the leading brewery agent of the city felt it necessary to rush into print attacking the movement.

Although there was no desire to attract outside attention, the publicity that was given to the different features and "doings" of the movement made it known all through New York State, and even beyond the borders of the State. Letters have been received from different parts of the country, from former pastors and former residents, and from men prominent in public life, who have been interested and who have added their prayers to the movement. This is a day of expectancy, and many are hoping that the time has come when our entire country may once more be awakened from its spiritual lethargy.

Those who came to look over the field and study the work, expected to find a great deal of emotion and terror, but instead they discovered a steady undercurrent of conviction that appealed to them as being permanent in its results. There has been very little that is superficial, very little to attract attention, and those who talk about "excitement" or "frenzied religion" have not been represented at any of the meetings. Everything has been kept in good control. This has appealed to the business men of the community, who gave their testimony at a platform meeting arranged for that purpose.

A brief history of the movement will give an idea of what has been done. The movement came entirely without plan or machinery. The pastors had only to direct and participate in a work that the Holy Spirit seems to have controlled from the very start. When the local Ministerial Association discussed the Week of Prayer at their December meeting, plans for union services of prayer were left to a committee, consisting of the Rev. Henry C. Cooper, the Rev. Fred Winslow Adams (President of the Association), and the Rev. George Edwin Talmage, with the latter as chairman. This committee held a meeting, and after a season of prayer decided to invite one minister to take charge of the entire week, that there might be a regular sequence of thought. Their choice then fell upon the Rev. George R. Lunn, who had lately come to the city as pastor of the First Reformed Church. Before he came here, he was an assistant to the Rev. Dr. Gregg, in the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn. Since the meetings have attracted attention, letters from Dr. Cuyler and Dr. McAfee have given much inspiration. One night the Lafayette Avenue Church met for special prayer for Schenectady. Mr. Lunn accepted the invitation to address the series of meetings, and announced a theme full of interest and power. It did not come out until after two or three weeks why he was willing to take on this extra work, and the first account of it was given in a sermon by the Rev. Mr. Adams at the State Street Church, when he took for his text the vision of St. Peter, followed at once by the coming of three men. It seems that Mr. Lunn, sitting in his study, had a kind of vision of the sufficiency of Christ—"He is all in all." Almost immediately afterward there came the telephoned request from the other three men, asking him to interpret the mission. He felt he could not refuse to go with them; and these meetings and this awakening have been the Spirit-guided result.

A "MIDNIGHT MEETING," AT THE SCHENECTADY REVIVAL

For many years there have been union meetings during the week of prayer, led by different men, preferably the latest arrivals in town, and with most desultory theme and attendance. Although it was a very bad week, and the weather inclement, the interest and attendance increased from day to day, until the people moved out of the chapel, where they had begun to hold services, into the church proper. Before the week was out, the church was packed to the doors. To Mr. Lunn and the other pastors this continually increasing attendance and interest spelled "opportunity," and with one consent the Association instructed the committee to go ahead, and plan an evangelistic campaign for the following week. Nineteen churches, representing eight denominations at once fell into line. It was thought that the common work could best be emphasized by a general exchange of pulpits, and the nineteen ministers each took two assignments, away from home, making thirty-eight exchanges in one day. Every man went where he was sent, and each reported afterward a most delightful day, while the congregations all spoke of the power of the message that had come to them. An impromptu meeting, for men only, in the Opera House, was very powerful and helpful.

The churches gave up all of their own evangelistic plans, and joined in the common movement under the slogan of "Aggressive Evangelism." At the State Street Methodist Church, of which the Rev. Fred Winslow Adams is pastor, Miss Bertha Sanford, a deaconess from Washington, was conducting a series of meetings. These were given up in common with the rest, and Miss Sanford entered upon the service of the committee, taking charge of the afternoon meetings for women, and singing at the evening meetings in the church. The Rev. George R. Lunn was naturally selected for the preacher of each evening, and the other pastors took such positions as could best help out the work. The committee divided up its responsibility in a way, one taking charge of the noon-meetings for business men, led by business men, in the Y. M. C. A. hall, providing the leaders, and looking after the arrangements. Another took charge of the afternoon meetings in the Emmanuel Baptist Church, and the third looked after the detail of the evening services in the State Street Methodist Church. The Rev. Robt. J. CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP

A Sermon by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon*

OUR text, as given in the Revised Version, is in one sense a definition of the attitude of a Christian government, although at first it does not seem to be such. "Our citizenship is in heaven" seems at first to place the Christian in a locality where presidential campaigns will not be much in evidence. The average person is not in the habit of thinking of heaven as a place where discussions on the tariff, foreign relations, theories of money or estimates concerning the need of a navy and army are much in demand. But we must look at the text closely in order to understand its exact meaning.

In the first place, the early Christian had no part, properly speaking, in the government of his times. The Jew lived under a complete tyranny. There was practically no right of suffrage known to the Jew in the time of Cæsar, or at any rate it was exceedingly limited. The government was dictatorial. It was, in fact, hateful to most of the Jews as a nation. Under their own theocracy they were in the habit of thinking of national life as dictated by Jehovah, and while the Christian was the most obedient of subjects, even to the tyranny, and honored the king or the magistrate because it was right to do so, his citizenship, in the larger sense of the term, was a remarkably restricted and limited affair compared with ours. There was the honored Greek phrase, "The Christian lives on the earth, but has his citizenship in heaven," which corresponds with our text, "Our citizenship is in heaven."

Early Christian Ideas

But even under such restricted rights of citizenship as the Jew held, it was entirely possible for the early Christian to have the largest possible conception of citizenship as it might be. And there is no better nor higher conception of what present-day citizenship is than that which is found in our text. For it is emphatically true that the highest form of citizenship recognizes first of all that the highest authority in all the government of men is not that which men make for themselves, without regard to a higher power, but the highest form of all recognizes God as the supreme ruler of the nation. In other words, the citizenship which is in heaven does not deny the necessity of its earthly duties, but magnifies and idealizes their importance because they are a part of the kingdom of God.

The unchristian idea of government is simply to be elected to an office, to draw the salary and have a certain political influence over a certain number of men, to get out of the position whatever of happiness or power the position may present. The man in political life who has no ideal as to patriotism, sees nothing beyond the fact of being elected and using the position afterwards for more or less selfish purposes. This kind of citizenship is of the earth. It is very earthy. It does not come down from above; it comes from beneath. It is the same thing in every age of the world, whether it exists under a nominal pagan administration or a nominal Christian. But the citizenship which is in heaven, places first of all the kingdom of God as the first object of every citizen's affection, and strives to realize that condition here upon the earth.

The Highest Patriotism

The highest form of patriotism known to-day is that which has at the heart of it the Lord's Prayer, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven." It does not try to get away from the earth. It does not shun the duties of the earth. It does not say they are of little account. It does not make the mistake made by the monks when they withdrew from all participation in worldly affairs and went off to make a little heaven of their own. It stays courageously and cheerfully in the world but does not conform to its selfish usages. In other words, the Christian citizen looks at the whole scheme of government from the viewpoint of the kingdom of God.

If it is true that this idea of heavenly citizenship, makes even more sacred than any other conception the daily duties of men in a civilized order of things, then Christendom should begin to learn that among the many things that are taught, for example, in the schools, the sacred duties of man in his relation to government should occupy a very prominent place. We say we must teach the boys and girls arithmetic and reading, spelling and geography, chemistry and science, language and botany and history, and we seem content to let the boys in our schools, academies, colleges and universities grow up without ever having tried to teach them the simplest matters connected with the life of the government of which they are continuously a part, and in which if they live at all they must take some share. How many college graduates in the United States understand even in a vague way the workings of a city government, the details of the construction of a State. How many boys in the high school, graduate with any definite knowledge of what it means to vote, or what the underlying principles are which should govern the choice of men for office? The time is very rapidly approaching when a complete scheme of any education worthy the idea will include a large and serious course in the study of human government, with the emphasis constantly laid upon the tremendous ethical feature which makes any government worth while.

Duties to be Studied

The thought of a nation existing simply for the purpose of extending its boundary by commercial conquest, or for the purpose of exacting revenue in order to maintain standing armies, navies, or works of defense, is an idea which is not worthy of the highest type of Christian citizenship. Surely, if a knowledge of figures and of correct methods of expression, knowledge of pagan history and of the stars in their movements, is considered essential to an educated mind, no less, and indeed far greater, is a knowledge of existing conditions in government life, and above all, a training which shall settle some convictions in the matter of what makes a citizen, which will endure throughout an entire lifetime. If there is one thing which the practical demagogue and selfish politician understands, it is the every-day details of the machinery at least of government life; and one reason why the scholar feels embarrassed in a political atmosphere, is because he is actually ignorant concerning the details of the political life as it has been shaped by other men around him. He is no match for the man who has made it a life-long study.

The Heavenly Ideal

The conviction of the Christian citizen is that while he has heaven's ideal concerning the earth's social compact, it does not make him visionary or impractical; rather it emphasizes the need of a more thorough knowledge of how men should live together here on the earth, but always with the emphasis placed upon the highest motive for human society. It is the attitude which Christ constantly and consistently took. In the prayer, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," he emphasized the summing up of his philosophy concerning human government. He recognized the fact that men, in order to exist along the highest plane of power, must live together under a certain fundamental agreement. Then it is perfectly proper, and indeed the only thing, for the man who takes this view to ask certain questions concerning the world in which he lives, which can be answered satisfactorily only in the light of the text, "Our citizenship (or our commonwealth) is in heaven," as an ideal which is to be wor out on the earth.

In the first place, then, the vision of Christ citizenship which the Christian beholds, is not impractical thing. It does not deal in impossibilit neither does it dwell in a region removed fr the necessary activity. In point of fact, no kind government worth having is possible unless one has spiritual imagination. The demagogue has no st imagination. The ward boss is without spiritual p spective. Citizenship is a dignified word which impl a constant desire to make things better. Earthly g ernment is not run by angels, but by men, and any m who is in the service of the government is bound have his weaknessss, his faults, and his limitatio Voters in a republic need constantly to bear this fa in mind. There is no criticism so harsh, and no abu so foolish, as that which falls upon any man w assumes to serve his country through any kind of o cial life. It is well enough for us to be exact in our r quirements of the men who are representatives of o ideas, but it is always well for us to remember th they are human at the best, and are working under h man limitations.

Evils to be Remedied

This fact, however, need not discourage the practica citizen from attempting many times to bring an ide condition out of a low and earthly one. It is at thi point that Christian citizenship very often receives it severest criticism, and meets with the greatest discour agement. Men are apt to say, even good men, "W cannot help ourselves. We must abide by what i rather than what might be." Men are ready to sa this in the great cities concerning the saloon, and th gambling house, and any great evil institution that ha taken deep root. They say conditions are such tha they cannot be changed. "We must abide by the fact in the case, and not deal in what might be." That attitude, however, would keep the world back in all kinds of barbarism for a limitless length of time. It is because from time to time in the history of the world, individuals have risen up to protest against some deep, long-continued wrong, that the wrong has finally been righted. The evil customs of the Middle Ages had certainly fastened a deep and powerful hold upon the minds and habits of the people; but the protesting voice and life of a man called Luther, helped the world to see the possibility of breaking away even from faiths and customs that were centuries old. If the Christian men and women of New York, or Chicago, or Philadelphia should together unite their Christian faith in a combined protest for an ideal condition in city government, and a protest against the saloon, now that we have two thousand years of Christianity to put it to shame, there is no doubt as to the result. If we who live in this city once yield to the common sophistry that because a minority of the people desire evil things, therefore the majority must submit, then we should have no better city ten years from now than we have at present. Or if we yield ourselves to a lazy indifference, which says good men cannot be elected to the best offices in the State, we at once shut the door to the reforms which the State so sadly needs at present.

Religion in Politics

The citizenship which is in heaven not only has an ideal, and believes in working it out on practical lines, but it sees no hope for the future unless the average voter is made to see the deepest possible meaning in government as a divine institution. It cannot be taught too early, nor emphasized too strongly with our children, that the social life of men is meant to be a divine thing. Politics is meant to be a form of the highest expression of the mind of God, and to this end the religious teaching of the citizen is the most important of all. The use of the Bible in our schools and colleges, the religious organizations which should have first place in all our educational plans, the constant and powerful training in the home, together with the constant and powerful training of the Church, should all work together to make religious citizens. I have no faith whatever in a citizenship which is intellectually and mentally strong and ambitious, if the true religious element is lacking. The government of men cannot become what it ought to become unless men recognize at the head of all government the presence and power of the Divine Being. Neither will men love one another as they should unless they also love God.

Jesus was the greatest statesman of the ages, and he never stated one truth in regard to the development of the race without stating the other. His commandment was, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," and "Thou Reformed Church, was asked to take charge of the musical services. A leaflet was printed for the meetings, containing sixteen favorite Gospel hymns. Mr. Welton Stanford, Jr., a young business man, was asked to look after the ushers, and attended to it each night with great efficiency. Mr. David B. Lyon, a prominent business man, was appointed treasurer of the committee. The money was all provided for by collections at the evening services, the people being very liberal, and showing by their response in this particular how thoroughly they approved of the work, as they also showed by their remarkable attendance from night to night. Each evening, Mr. Lunn preached a sermon, and Mr. Adams made an appeal, Miss Sanford singing at the appropriate times, and bringing home the lesson in that effective way.

From the very first, men began making decisions, taking a stand for Christ, as also have the women and children. There was no evening service without a number of decisions. It soon became necessary to organize a band of personal workers, and this was given into the charge of the Rev. J. C. Hamilton, pastor of the United Presbyterian Church, who is also the secretary of the Ministerial Association, and who is looking after the cards that are signed, keeping track of them, and turning them over to the various pastors, according to church preference. Converts' meetings have been held, and these have been directed by the Rev. Henry C. Cooper, of the committee.

The committee and the singers have taken up a number of lines of work during the weeks. Two nights, they spent the early part of the evening going from saloon to saloon, singing in each place, and inviting people to the church service later. In nearly every case they were received with courtesy.

The committee also went out to noon factory meetings, and in these and other ways gave many a chance to share in the pleasure of the singing, who had no other chance. The evangelist deaconess has also gone to many homes, to sing to invalids, in connection with the work of the Y. W. C. A.

On the last week a hall was hired right off the street, and "midnight" services were begun, from 10.30 to 12. The purpose of these meetings was to reach those who might "drop in on the way home." The very first meeting was successful. Earlier in the week, a letter had been received asking for prayers, and signed "A Minister's Son." After the meeting had been in progress for a little while, the hall door opened and a man dropped in. When the call was given for any one to raise his hand who desired to accept Christ, this man raised his hand, and before twelve o'clock he made his peace with Christ. It came out later that he was the minister's son, and the meeting seemed to have been providentially planned for him.

There have been many notable features of these weeks. One man walked four miles to church, and could not get in because of the crowds. He then walked to the Opera House, where a second large gathering was being addressed by the Rev. G. F. Whittemore, and could not get in there. He went back home disappointed. On Monday night he tried again, and this time he found room. When the invitation was given, he was among the first to rise. At the business men's noon prayer-meeting one day during the last week he was present, having once more taken his long walk to tell them that he had become an evangelist in his own school district, and to ask for their prayers.

The attendance at the afternoon meeting for women has grown from two hundred to a thousand, with added interest day by day. The evening meetings were also growing in power, until the State Street Church was packed to the doors, with many standing all through the sermon. In that service, about eleven hundred people stayed to the after meeting. In fifteen minutes time, one hundred and one rose to give testimony, and a score to accept Christ. Another night, one hundred and three testified in seventeen minutes. It is this marvelous holding on that has impressed the ministers. The people would not go home, but stayed for the after meeting, and then stayed again, sometimes until half past ten.

The Children's Meeting one Friday afternoon was a surprise to everyone. The church and chapel were packed, and on a roll-call it was found that forty Sunday Schools were represented, with fourteen different denominations. There were probably eight hundred children. After Miss Sanford and the chairman had spoken, it was suggested that the children might march down the street. Permission was received from the Mayor of the city, and the entire party left the church singing "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" They marched down the main street of the city to the railroad track, returning to Crescent Park, where they formed a large group, and sang, "Stand up, stand up for Jesus!" It happened just at the time when the men were coming home from work, and created quite a stir, the line of children meeting the line of workingmen and impressing them with their song.

The meetings have been too recent and the growth too rapid for one to give a connected and systematic account of all that has been done. What are the results? We can not tell. They can not be measured by a show of hands. Scores have stood up in meeting, scores have signed cards. Many have doubtless been saved who have given no visible sign. The after-life of the city alone can show how much God hath wrought for it at this time.

CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP

salt love thy neighbor as thyself." When the matter is sifted down to its last analysis, it will be found that the safeguards of any government reside in two great organizations—the church and the home. There would be no church unless there were a home, and there would be no home, in the best sense of the word, without a church. It is painful to any one who thinks, to walk the streets of any city—large or small—and note the large number of boys, some of them under ten years of age, who roam about apparently without any parental care, with no thought of anything but the street life. It would be interesting, if at the same time sorrowful, to know how many boys there are in our own neighborhood, immediately about this church, who can be found upon the streets between the hours of eight and ten o'clock at night. It is astonishing what supreme indifference seems to mark the lives of many fathers and mothers who, if they ever think at all, must remember that such carelessness in regard to the children that belong to them is simply adding to the perplexing problems of the government of the world.

The Christian citizen's actual beginning in the way of activity of necessity begins with his own immediate neighborhood. We are not so often concerned in the citizenship of a republic as we are in that of the ward or township where we reside. But what we do in our own city goes to make up the sum total of the life of the State and the Republic at large. The thought of heavenly citizenship put into active form here on the earth shames every true Christian man and woman as he thinks of the exhibition of human selfishness which is displayed in his own city. The great enemies of any city's life are: first, greed; second, indifference; third, positive lawlessness. It is a hopeful sign that the people at large are beginning to judge their fellow citizens by some standard of required unselfishness. The man who attempts to get more than a proper share out of the needs of a community is beginning to find his proper place in the minds of the people, according to his selfish or unselfish attitude as a citizen.

There was a time when no judgment was passed upon a man's method of making money or "earning," as he calls it, the largest possible amount that could be made out of the people. But that time is rapidly passing away. All over this country voters are being instructed by the rising sentiment of moral energy along the line of ethical purpose. The word "heaven" itself, which is the centre of our text, has at times been connected with the old Anglo-Saxon "to heave up." In other words, heaven has been thought of as something which has been heaved or "heaven up." And the true thought of Christian citizenship, which I believe is gradually permeating society, regards the sacred duty of citizenship as a power which heaves up the old order of things away from the dull, pestilential lowlands of selfishness, into the clear atmosphere of life and light which lies above.

Grounds for Hope

The citizen whose commonwealth is in heaven is not a hopeless man. He believes in the forces of righteousness which are at work in God's own world. There cannot be such a thing as a hopeless Christianity unless we resolve that the entire plan of God for the world through Christ has been a mistake. The most vital mistake which the selfish politician always makes is the mistake of leaving God all out of the account. This Republic of ours contains a great leaven of righteousness. There are times when men seem fearful of the future, and it is simply campaign buncombe which throws the whole country to the dogs in case some particular party is not victorious. The people understand these things better. And the Christian citizen and voter who includes God in history believes in the victorious destiny of this country. In spite of the diversity of its political faith, of its North and South, of its race problem and its city slum, and in spite of its condition at present with the liquor evil, in spite of the misrule of the cities and the birth of the words like "graft" which have become a part of our national vocabulary, the citizen whose citizenship is in heaven still believes that there is a God there, and here, too, and that his purposes will not be thwarted nor his design for America be defeated by any man or party of men.

This country had its birth in the fear of God and the love of liberty. The State in which we have our citizenship on earth was born in the same atmosphere and nurtured at the beginning in the same. In spite of the selfishness of petty political factions, which disregard the great good of the whole, there is a leaven of righteousness derived from things that are above, not from those that are beneath. In that hope let us go to our daily work; let us pray to God for wisdom, asking him especially that we may understand better what are the issues of life and who is the master of the affairs of men, asking also that we may be led out of any possible prejudice or mistake into the broadest possible liberty as children of God; that we may do what will please him in the building up of a government among men that shall be indeed like the vision of the New Jerusalem let down out of heaven, a city which is four square, where the gates are pearls and the streets are full of boys and girls playing therein; where the vision of the social compact is not dimmed by the clash of men's greed or any selfish interest, but where all men shall work together for the permanent upbuilding of a republic whose brotherhood shall be known to the ends of the earth, united by common ties of mutual interest which have grown out of the soil of a permanent faith in a God who is ruler of all the earth, and in whose name we offer daily the common prayer, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

Russia's Struggle for Freedom

Quiet Restored by Military Force --- Will the Government Yield at Last?

ALTHOUGH the revolutionary movement in Russia has been temporarily crushed in the capital by Gen. Trepoff's iron hand, is has apparently spread in other directions far beyond the power of the government to suppress it, even by the most rigid military measures. Cable dispatches contain information of many sympathetic risings. Immediately after the tragic events of Sunday, January 22, when several thousand workmen, with many women and little children, were wantonly slaughtered by Cossacks and infantry in Palace Square and at Trinity Bridge, the Narva Gate, the Moscow Gate, the Alexander Garden, Admiralty Square, Vassili Island and other neighborhoods in and near St. Petersburg, there was a temporary lull in the capital. This was due to the presence of 100,000 troops, largely Cossacks and Circassians, who, under the order of Grand Duke Vladimir, terrorized the populace, and cowed it for the moment. But the revolutionists had only paused to gather new strength and to perfect their plans for renewing the struggle to better advantage. Within twenty-four hours came the news that the people of Moscow had risen, and that Russian Poland, Finland, and the Caucasus were in revolt. Sympathetic movements took place almost simultaneously at Riga, Tula, Ekaterinburg, Reval, Kishineff, Libau, Lodz, Saratoff, and Vilna, with serious riots.

THE CEREMONY OF BLESSING THE WATERS OF THE NEVA

It was when this was taking place that the Czar's life was attempted recently

New excitement was added meanwhile to the situation, by the intelligence of a massacre of workers at Kolpino, near the capital. About 25,000 persons started from Kolpino, to march to the Czar's palace at Tsarskoe-Selo, where they intended to make a final appeal to the Emperor for a hearing. But the "Little Father" would not receive them, and several miles from Kolpino, they encountered a regiment of infantry and a field battery, which the Czar's commander of the palace garrison had dispatched to meet them. The troops fired upon them, and many were killed and wounded, the remainder being compelled to retreat.

In St. Petersburg itself, there is a general feeling of insecurity and apprehension. Many persons have sent their wives and children to places of safety, dreading the worst. It is said that Grand Duke Vladimir, the author of the Sunday massacre, has recently devoted himself to the study of the French Revolution, and he is reported to have observed that "Russia must not be guilty of weakness, which was the original cause of the downfall of the French monarchy." As a part of his scheme of dealing with the situation, he persuaded the Czar to appoint Gen. Trepoff, the military Governor of Moscow, as Governor of St. Petersburg. Trepoff, the correspondents declare, is notorious as one of the most bloodthirsty and unscrupulous men in all Russia, and since assuming command as "Grand Executioner" in the capital, he has instituted a system of assault, intimidation and arrest, which extends to all classes. Any man who is suspected in the remotest degree of affiliation with the revolutionists, or who is accused, however unjustifiably, is liable to be summarily shot down, beaten, or arrested and imprisoned. Leading editors have been arrested. Students have been warned to remain at home. Collisions between the police or troops and citizens, who are not to be classed as riotous, are frequent. These encounters are marked by an official brutality that can hardly be exaggerated.

Gen. Trepoff has revived the censorship in full force, and very little real news of the insurrection is now permitted to go to the outside world. But, on the other hand, he has unquestionably displayed skill in dealing with the workingmen. He has issued a notice to the workers urging them to return to their labor, and intimating that the Czar has their interests at heart, and may be expected, by his acts, to convince them of the fact. In this note, he invites them to return to work, promising them, in the Emperor's name, a revision of the general law, so as to restrict the hours of labor, the institution of a plan for State insurance, and otherwise to meet their demands so far as the law will permit, and guarantees them protection against interference by agitators. It is said that Nicholas, who is still hidden away in some one of his many palaces, will soon issue an ukase assuring the workers that he is deliberating over their condition and their needs. This, in conjunction with the notice by Trepoff, the government hopes, will result in pacifying the workers, not only in the capital but elsewhere. It is not believed, however, that this tardy promise of recognition from the "Little Father," who lately greeted them with bullets and Cossack lances, will be accepted in good faith.

THE CZAR'S PALACE GUARD AT PETERHOF PARK

The revolutionary movement is now much more than an economic question; it aims at nothing short of the great national reforms outlined at recent meetings held in St. Petersburg by the Economic Society, the Juridical Society, the Medical Society, the Engineers' and Architects' Association, and the leading litterateurs, who have declared that "the only means of tranquilizing the public mind, guaranteeing the lasting security of citizens, and enabling Russia to maintain the esteem of the civi world, is a convocation of a representative asser endowed with full liberty for discussing public mat and passing resolutions thereon." The formal mands, as put forth by the leaders, are these:

First—the immediate cessation of the war.

Second—The summoning of a constituent assembly of representatives of the people, elected by universal and equal suffrage and direct secret ballot.

Third—The removal of class and race privileges and restrictions.

Fourth—The inviolability of the person and domicile.

Fifth—The freedom of conscience, speech, the press, meetings, strikes and political association.

Upon this platform the pres movement in the Czar's empire m stand or fall. It represents universal desire of the Russian p ple as a nation, and although realization is deferred for a time the strong power of a military d potism, it must ultimately triumj

Correspondents unite in the vi that it is hopeless, in the prese condition of affairs, to attempt secure the desired reforms by stre fighting. As long as the autocra controls the army, the Czar's thron however uncomfortable it may b will be secure. Should there l any serious defection among tl troops, whatsoever, it would be a evil omen for Nicholas and his su roundings. Thus far, the popula has been practically unarmed an unorganized in a military sens though there are not wanting evidences that bombs an the torch may yet play an important part in what is t follow; but they can do little against Russia's va military organization, should it remain loyal.

Governor-General Trepoff says in an interview:

"The vast majority of the workmen were deceive into associating themselves with a political movement The Government intends to do everythin possible under the law, to see that the receive justice. People talk of a revolu tion or an era of bomb-throwing. I am a optimist. I have no fear of a revolution As for bomb-throwers, they are few i number. They may attempt something but nothing will be accomplished in that fashion. The government cannot permit conspirators against it to plot and agitate as they please."

Warsaw, the third largest city in the empire, promises to become a storm centre. It is the headquarters of the Polish revolutionists, and has been alive with rebellions ever since the troubles began at the capital. There have been repeated street fights, and many citizens have been killed or wounded, although the official reports make the casualties small. At Radom and Lodz, two other Polish industrial centres, not far distant from Warsaw, fierce fighting took place, as the result of a general strike of the workingmen.

One day the bakers of Warsaw struck, after baking the morning's batch of bread. The city water-works employees followed, and then the men of the great iron works joined. Learning that the bakers had struck, all classes rushed to lay in a stock of bread. The police guarded the bakeries, and anxious wealthy people in furs, drove up in sleighs, and attempted to buy bread. The city's supply of bread was soon exhausted. The strike is not caused by any specific demands, but a vague longing for better conditions. Three hundred thousand are out of work in Poland, excluding the strikers. There are 30,000 troops in Warsaw.

It is significant that the intellectual class in Russia favors the people in the present crisis. Many professional men, editors, teachers, students, and authors have openly espoused the cause of the workers. They do not blame Minister DeWitte or Prince Mirsky, for they believe that these two officials honestly endeavored to avert the trouble, which reached a climax in the massacre of what is now known in the capital as "Vladimir's loody Sunday." There was a moment when the slight-t concession by the Emperor would have settled every-ing; but as though impelled by an irresistible impulse o choose the worst course, Nicholas withdrew himself, nd left the grim tragedy to be acted out by the Grand ucal coterie, with Vladimir as leader, absolute in mili-ry control. It is not surprising, therefore, that the nger of the people, thus betrayed to the butchers by eir own sovereign, whom they revered as the "Little ather," and the "Merciful Czar," should have turned thoughts of inflicting vengeance on all the Grand ukes.

In this connection, it has been suggested in some uarters, that the whole revolutionary movement was esignedly fanned into a flame for the purpose of en-bling Russia to extricate herself from the disastrous anchurian campaign with as little loss of prestige as ossible. According to this theory, Father Gapon cted as an agent provocateur, and skilfully precipitated he terrible drama of January 22. While such an ex-lanation is too horrible to be entertained for a moment, he civil strife may yet result in putting an end to Rus-ia's Eastern campaign, especially if it be true, as Moukden dispatches now report, that mutiny has broken ut in Kouropatkin's army. Russia will hardly under-ake to send the desired reinforcements of 200,000 addi-ional troops to Manchuria under present conditions. There is a rumor that Kouropatkin has already begun o negotiate for peace with Gen. Oyama.

Gapon, the priest, who led the people on their march to the palace, is said to be wounded and in the hospital. He has issued several proclamations or manifestoes, which are calculated to stir up the deepest antagonism toward the Czar and his advisers. In one he utters his "pastoral curse" against the soldiers and officers who fired upon the populace, and blesses those soldiers who refused to slay their brothers. In another, addressed to the workers, he speaks of the "bestial Czar" and "his jackal Ministers." It concludes with these words: "Let us tear up all portraits of the bloodthirsty Czar, and say to him, 'Be thou accursed, with all thy most reptile blood.' " A third proclamation denounces "the miscreant Czar and his malicious officials, who are robbers of the treasury and plunderers of the Russian nation." It threatens vengeance on all the "imperial reptilian blood," and on the Ministers also—"Death to them all." Far more temperate and convincing is the manifesto of the writers and educated liberals, which declares that "the public should understand that the government has declared war upon the entire Russian people," and summons "all the vital enegies of Russian society to the assistance of the workingmen, who began the struggle for the common cause of the whole people."

It now seems certain that the revolutionary movement will hereafter be characterized by different methods and better preparation. The leaders are apparently convinced that disorder and street demonstrations are impotent against the Czar's armies, and unless some extraordinary incident should occur to provoke them, any early revival of the recent demonstration is not expected, in the capital, at least. St. Petersburg, however, will probably remain under rigid military law until the Czar feels his capital sufficiently safe to justify his emergence from his present retreat. Then, with the return of the Czarina and the heir to the throne of "all the Russias," the three frightened and fugitive Grand Dukes and their satellites, the autocracy will resume supreme control, until the breaking of the next thunderstorm drives it again to cover.

The Manchurian Campaign

A St. Petersburg dispatch, which seems to have escaped the censor's eye, says that Gen. Kouropatkin has opened negotiations with Gen. Oyama, the Japanese commander, looking to a cessation of hostilities. It is said that some of the Russian regiments from the provinces stubbornly refused to advance against the Japanese. Oyama's pickets, who kept in close touch with the Russians, informed the latter of the revolution. This made Kouropatkin's soldiers discontented; thousands of the men were in sympathy with the people at home.

This news from Kouropatkin, taken in conjunction with the situation in Russia itself, has made the government alarmed. One high official is quoted as declaring that the government now recognizes that a Constitution can no longer be withheld, and that the people must be granted a voice in public affairs, or the present regime will assuredly be overthrown.

"BLIZZARD DAY" AT THE BOWERY MISSION

WEDNESDAY, January 25th, will long be remembered as a "Blizzard Day," in New York City and elsewhere. Even well-clad, well-fed, well-protected people who were obliged to encounter the angry elements, the swirling, blinding snow, the icy hurricane blasts, that lashed human faces like whipcords, and benumbed the facial muscles like an application of cocaine, cowered under the tyranny of the Ice King. But what of the poor wretches who had no kindly home shelter, who were faint already for want of food, and had only a miserable pretence of clothing to cover them?

In the midst of it all, there staggered into the Bowery Mission a poor human wastrel, with the collar of a thin, ragged coat tied round his throat with twine. The wonder was that he was alive, for when examination was made it was found that the aforesaid ragged coat, a pair of trousers to match, and a pair of tattered shoes, were all the clothing he had on. No shirt, no undershirt, no socks. Poor fellow! And there were hundreds on "Blizzard Day" nearly as badly off.

A SCENE AT THE BOWERY MISSION FREE LABOR BUREAU DURING THE BLIZZARD

The officials at the Municipal Lodging-House, and at the police stations, did everything within their power to help the storm sufferers, but it was at the Missions that they found their chief relief.

The Bowery Mission was a scene of the most pathetic suffering and unwonted activity. The Superintendent and his wife were themselves storm-bound in the snowdrifts between Washington and Philadelphia. But the discipline and organization of the Mission staff were equal to the sudden demand made upon it. The doors of the Mission were, as usual, open all day, and no one was turned away. The Assistant Superintendent, Mr. John H. Long, seeing the rapidly-increasing crowd of suffering men, quickly got into communication with Dr. Klopsch, who just as quickly gave orders that the Mission must be kept open all night, and that the men must be well taken care of, regardless of expense.

The two secretaries of the Free Labor Bureau, Mr. Fred N. Card, and Mr. J. T. Hunt, turned from their ordinary daily duties of registering men for work in the country, towards securing snow-shoveling work for them in the city. In this effort splendid service was rendered by Mr. Donovan, who lives next door, and by Deputy Commissioner of Street Cleaning Rice, who arranged to take, in various batches, several hundreds of the men to work upon the snow.

When the time came for the ordinary evening meeting at eight o'clock the benches were all crowded, but still they kept coming in. After the meeting, the weaker and more helpless were sent to beds in the nearby lodging-houses. This made room for others, who were clamoring at the doors. At one o'clock, the usual morning breakfast was dispensed, when it was found that, notwithstanding the extra provision made at the Municipal Lodging-House, the police stations and the hotels, hundreds were compelled to be out in the storm all night.

After the one o'clock breakfast, the Mission quickly filled again, and, as in the past, the old Bowery Mission proved to hundreds a refuge and "a shelter in the time of storm."

Russia's Strong Hand

ONCE more the iron hand of Russia has succeeded in cowing the Czar's subjects into apparent obedience, and the revolutionary agitation in St. Petersburg has been suppressed, for a time at least. It is, however, a slumbering volcano, liable at any hour to break forth in violent eruption. Trepoff, the tyrannical Governor-General of Moscow, is, for the moment, the supreme dictator in whose hands rests the life or death of the citizens, and his rule in the capital will be marked by uncompromising severity. The government needed a man to fill the role formerly occupied by DePlehve, and it chose Trepoff as best fitted for the purpose.

But while repressive measures may succeed temporarily in putting down street parades and demonstrations, it is beyond the power of Emperor Nicholas and his military and police to stamp out, by Cossack lances and machine guns, the love of liberty that has been kindled anew in the hearts of the people. A lamp has been lighted in Russia, which will burn with ever-increasing brightness until it has illuminated the whole nation. It lights the way to freedom, and we believe its extinguishment to be a task far beyond Czars, Grand Dukes, or military dictators, even though backed by powerful armies. "Courage," said the priest reformer Gapon, addressing the workers from his hospital cot whereon he lay severely wounded, "Courage, brothers, we shall yet win; Russia shall yet be free before the whole world, as the result of our sacrifice." Was not this an echo of Latimer, who, while in the fire, said bravely to his companion: "Be of good comfort. . . . We shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England, as I trust shall never be put out." Both were priestly reformers; both fought for civil and political, as well as ecclesiastical liberty, for release from a tyranny that sought not only to dominate the body, but the mind, and even the soul of the people.

If Gapon, the Russo-Greek priest, who seeks to free Russia from her religious superstitions as well as from her military oppresssors, should die by Trepoff's order, as seems probable, the cause will be only the stronger. Even now, official Russia recognizes that a Constitution is inevitable, if the crown is to be saved. It is folly to expect that the "iron hand" will make an aroused nation permanently submissive. Russia is awake at last, and with opened eyes the people are beginning to discern the shining path that leads to national freedom. Moderation and conciliation by the Czar's government now may accomplish much in preserving popular order, while an opposite policy would provoke a renewal of violence and bloodshed, culminating in a repetition of the frightful excesses of the "Terror," but on a scale of magnitude that would shock the world.

The Child Slave's Sad Lot

IT is cheering to learn that the Child Labor Committee, recently organized for the purpose of investigating the condition under which children are employed in the factories and workshops of New York State, is making substantial progress in the direction of reforms. New York is not alone in these industrial abuses, for they exist in many other States, and in country manufacturing districts as well as in large cities. Their unchecked prevalence in the Empire State may be judged by the fact that, up to a very recent date, over 500 illegal employers of child labor had been found, yet there had not been a single conviction under the law. Within the last few weeks the first conviction has been secured, and the constitutionality of the law has been upheld by the State courts.

It would be difficult to imagine anything more pitiful than the condition of the children in some of the factories. Hundreds of wan, pinched-looking little creatures under fourteen, with attenuated figures and prematurely aged faces, were kept at work from daylight until dark, in the most unwholesome places. One inspector reports: "Dozens of them were in bare feet, running through water on the floor, half an inch deep, for the material had to be kept moist. Such tiny-looking things they were, with bodies that looked as though they might be crushed by a man's fingers." Little tots of seven and eight are found in these places, where all that is sweet and delightful in childhood is criminally sacrificed through the heartless greed of contractors and the ignorance or indifference of parents. And we have reason to fear that this picture of child slavery is only too common in many localities; indeed, so common that it has ceased to excite remark.

Let us hope that the day may be not far off when to deprive an American child, however poor, of its right to education and healthful recreation during the years of juvenility, will be treated like any other crime and visited with proper punishment. If parents cannot or will not take care of their children, then it must become the duty of the State to step in and save its future citizens from the condition of moral and physical degeneracy, to which the present system of child-labor must ultimately bring them.

Revival Lessons

NEWS that should stir Christians in every city of our land to earnest prayer and effort, comes from two widely separated centres of population. Denver, Colo., has been moved, as never before, by a revival that has brought thousands into the light of the Gospel, and in Schenectady, N. Y., a great multitude are earnestly seeking the Saviour. The methods in the two cases differ widely. In Denver, a corps of evangelists, with Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman at their head, have been preaching with Pentecostal power; while at Schenectady the movement has been conducted by the home pastors, who have united heart and soul in the work. The results are alike, proving that the Spirit is not confined to any one method of operations. The one feature which appears in both revivals is the significant one, that the Christian people in both cities held united meetings to plead at the Throne of Grace for an outpouring of the Spirit. The prayers were answered in both instances and the dissimilar methods were both blessed.

The lesson to be learned is unmistakable. It has been taught by similar movements in the past, but never so conspicuously as in these two instances. The way to a revival is through prayer. Artificial means, the organization of committees, the distribution of religious literature, the canvass of the city's population, are all good in their way, and all contribute to the desired end; but the beginning is with the Lord. There must be an earnest, intense desire in the hearts of his people for a revival of his work, and a continuous pleading with him for the blessing. It is not that he is reluctant to give it; it is not that he is slow to hear, but, as Christ taught by his parable of the importunate widow, that he wishes to test the sincerity of his people. So much do these two revivals teach, and it remains with us to learn the lesson.

Are there cities in which a revival is needed? Alas, where is the city which does not need one! There are everywhere heathen as ignorant of the power of Christianity as an African savage. There are others, who know the truth, and have sat under the Gospel all their lives, yet have never sought the blessing for themselves. It is the mission of the Church to gather in both classes. But the work is too great for its power. Only through the influence of the Holy Spirit can it be done. God is ready to give the Spirit to those who ask. The way is open to all and the opportunity is with us. Let it not be said that it was allowed to pass unused. What a mighty awakening there might be if in every city through the country a group of Christians were found, who cry as did Jacob, "We will not let thee go until thou bless us."

Woman's Handicap

THE handicap which woman must continue to accept, when competing with man in the professions or in trade, is her lesser physical strength. In the long run, a woman of ordinary health, can do thirty days' work in a month, but she is the exception who can do it, day in and day out, as a man does, without an occasio break or an occasional day off for rest. Quite recer in Paris, France, statistics have been gathered, show that women do not there succeed in the learned prof sions, because they cannot stand the strain; they bre down nervously sooner than men. In France, wom have for centuries been associated in business with m and have manifested immense capacity for money-ma ing and saving. But they have, as a rule, conduct their operations from their homes as a background.

Here in America there are successful women docto lawyers, editors, and merchants in every city. Wom endowed with brains, perseverance and belief in the selves do not go to the wall readily, though they co fess, if they are candid, that they are unduly weight in the race. The ideal situation for a woman is administer money, not to earn it; to preside over home, not toil and moil and strive to keep the home f others. But few of us in these days of intensity a hurry can compass ideal conditions. We must do o best with what we have.

The gracious woman, fair, sweet, sunny-hearted a sincere, who, as wife and mother, manages her hous hold, and focuses the worshipful love of her husba and children, is the envied figure in our modern civiliz tion. All honor and reverence be hers, if in additic to the legitimate offices which are hers, she is able t help maintain the family, bring funds to its exchequ assist in bringing the family forward socially, and i educating the boys and girls. That thousands of o married women do much to aid their husbands an increase the income speaks well for the versatility, cou age, and resourcefulness of women in this land.

The Blizzard a Work-Bringer

WHILE the great winter storm of January 25 wa seizing a large section of the country in its frigi grasp, blockading traffic with its huge drifts, and caus ing widespread inconvenience to multitudes, there wa one class at least to whom it seemed a blessing in dis guise. Within twelve hours after the blizzard began fifteen thousand men, drawn from the great army o the unemployed, were at work clearing the New Yorl streets.

At this time, when there is so much suffering among the unemployed, the opportunity to give work, even fo a brief period, to so large a number, was a most wel come one. For their sake, the good people of the metropolis could bear with greater equanimity and for titude the hardships of the wintry gale and the driving snow. Fifteen thousand stout pairs of arms—representing, no doubt, several times that number of feebler ones in tenement homes—soon made the thoroughfares passable. And to these must be added many more thousands in other cities, to whom the blizzard was a welcome work-bringer.

There are few burdens or sorrows in this world of ours that do not hide somewhere behind them a blessing, if we will only look for it.

Among the Workers

REV. HOMER W. TOPE, D.D., of the New York Anti-Saloon League, has lately been conducting a most effective platform campaign in many different States. He is regarded as one of the ablest exponents of temperance themes before the people to-day.

—THE EIGHTY-FIFTH birthday of Fanny Crosby, the blind writer of many famous hymns, takes place on March 24, and will be appropriately celebrated by many friends, who will send to the aged Christian their kind remembrances on that occasion.

Relics of Egypt

DURING the past nine years, explorations of the soil of Karnak, near Luxor, in Upper Egypt, have been carried on by the Egyptian Service of Antiquities. The object designed was to cover the great Temple of Ammon, set up again its pillars, and restore it to the condition it was in when it began to fall into decay. M. Legrain, who has been conducting the work, has just discovered a perfect treasury of ancient Egyptian art. It is a pit, which had been filled with statues and monuments of kings, and their wives, and children. They had been cast into the pit as if by some revolution, and not stored there with any attempt at order. More than eight thousand of these exquisitely finished statues have already been raised. Some of them are in gilded bronze, and others of granite, beryl, basalt, and petrified wood. Among them is one that has a special interest for Bible students. The central illustration on this page shows the scene when the excavators came upon the statue of Menephthah, the Pharaoh whose heart was hardened, and who, after passing through the plagues, let the people go, and then followed them to the Red Sea to bring them back to bondage. It bears his name, so that there is no doubt of its identity. It is possible to see now, after making due allowance for the flattery of the sculptor, just how this obstinate monarch looked. In time, doubtless, a photograph of the statue itself will be taken, and the Jews will look on the face of their persecutor. A second statue, or rather pair, are those of a Pharaoh and his wife, who reigned about 1490 B.C., or soon after the traditional date of the Exodus. The king's statue bears the name of Sonnefer, and it will be for the Egyptologists to discover what Pharaoh it was who bore that name. The gem of the collection, however, is an emblematical figure of Rameses II, the Pharaoh who began the oppression of the Israelites. He was the Pharaoh whose daughter adopted Moses, and from whose face Moses fled to Midian. He reigned more than sixty years. This statue represents the king in his early manhood, kneeling before the statue of his god Ammon. The statues show how high a state of civilization there must have been in ancient Egypt. The contrast between that and its present condition is a striking commentary on the prophecy of God's Word:

INTERESTING RELICS OF ANCIENT EGYPT, RECENTLY DISCOVERED AT KARNAK

Government Receivership

A new strain has been put on the Monroe Doctrine by the complications in San Domingo. Complaints have been made by certain European creditors of that Republic, to our Government, that a condition of financial chaos prevails there, and they ask us either to put matters straight, or agree to some other Power doing so. President Morales probably received some intimation of the fact, for he has requested the United States to assume charge of the national finances. The proposal is that we collect the revenues, have charge of the customs houses, pay over forty-five per cent. of the receipts to the Dominican Government for its current expenses, and apply the balance to the payment of foreign creditors. The fact that San Domingo might do this itself instead of calling on the United States to do it, is a confession of impotency that cannot be overlooked. It is practically a receivership of a peculiarly difficult character. It is also one that the people of San Domingo do not welcome, and they resent their President making the request. The statement is made that it will require nearly half a century at the present rate of receipts to relieve the country of its urgent obligations. It will involve trouble and difficulty, but if we do not undertake it, we must consent to foreign interference, which might involve a contravention of the Monroe Doctrine. We are in the position of sponsors for them, and are so regarded by European Powers. They naturally expect that as we shield them from punishment, we will see that they do not transgress the principles of ordinary morality. This is a difficult duty to lay upon us, and in the performance of it we learn how true was the wise king's warning.

He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it (Prov. 11: 15).

A Thief's Plea

Among the criminals awaiting sentence in Judge McMahon's court in New York a few days ago, was a man of aristocratic family and good education. He was charged with larceny, and there were fifteen other cases against him aggregating four thousand dollars. It was proved that he had previously served four terms in prison, varying from one year to four. The judge said he had received several letters from people of undoubted respectability, asking him to show mercy to the prisoner, because of the high station of his family. The prisoner also put in a plea for mercy on the ground of "hereditary moral obliquity." He said he had begun life with every advantage; he had been gently born and bred; had been sent to a first class school, and to the most famous university in the world, yet he had squandered all his advantages and had sunk to the position of a common thief. He believed that his moral obliquity was a disease which rendered him irresponsible. The judge thought otherwise, and sentenced him to five years in State prison. He reminded the prisoner that his plea made his offence all the greater, because he had sinned against light and knowledge. The principle was sound, though it is too often forgotten by people who have sat all their lives under the preaching of the Gospel, yet continue impenitent.

Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required (Luke 12: 48).

New York in a Blizzard

Not since the memorable blizzard of March 13, 1888, has New York experienced so severe a storm as that of Jan. 25th. It was born of the union of a storm from the lake region, and one that, rising in the Carolinas, swept up the coast from Virginia. It brought with it gales of increasing intensity and a heavy downfall of snow, which drifted before the wind to an immense depth. The wind was registered at forty-five miles an hour, but its fierce gusts appeared much greater. Vehicles were blown over and foot-passengers had great difficulty in keeping the perpendicular. They tottered along through the snow, half-blinded and panting, chasing hats that were torn from their heads, and slipping on the icy pavements where the wind had blown bare places. Street cars went out of business early in the storm, but happily the city now has its Subway, which relieved the discomfort of travel. From early morning until six o'clock in the evening the storm continued in full force. During that time nine and a-half inches of snow fell, but that measurement did not represent the difficulty, owing to the heavy drifts. Five deaths occurred in the streets, chiefly from heart failure; and eleven other persons fell helpless in the storm, and were taken by the ambulances to the hospitals. The trains coming into New York had a terrible experience. Four hundred passengers on the Empire State Express had a night of hardship. The train was due at ten o'clock, but it was half-past ten when it left Albany. At Poughkeepsie, one of the two powerful engines which had been dragging the train through the snow, was disabled, and it was not until nine in the morning that the journey to New York could be resumed. Similar experiences are told of other lines. Amid all the discomfort there was one ray of brightness. Thousands of the city's unemployed men were set to work the next day, on the gigantic task of removing the snow from the streets and carting it away to the river, and no one who could handle a shovel was refused employment. It is so with all God's Providences. Out of the trials and discomforts of life there come blessings which relieve suffering.

He scattereth his bright cloud. . . . He causeth it to come, whether for correction or for mercy (Job 37: 10, 13).

How Jesus Kept the Sabbath

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

THEY miss the main point in the Bethesda story who make this a lesson on the mission of miracles, or the relation of sin to sickness, and of wholeness to holiness, or the duty of doing good in general. The golden text that Christ put with this miracle as its key, is: "My Father worketh even until now, and I work," which means that God-like, Christ-like works of beneficence are not to halt on the Sabbath, but to go on unceasingly every day—work for gain being suspended one day to give work for God and man fuller opportunity. In short, Jesus taught the Pharisees who made the Sabbath an "empty day" of laborious idleness, interrupted only by prayer, that the Sabbath is not truly kept by doing nothing, but by doing good—a lesson still needed. How much it is needed, any teacher may learn who will ask his class at the start of this lesson "How should the Lord's Day be kept?" to which the answers will be a list of things not to be done, with very little, save church going, on the positive side.

I. How the Divine Father keeps the Sabbath. My Father worketh even until now. This means, as the context shows, that God works on the Sabbath, as on every other day, which implies that those who do godlike work may, and should keep it up every day in the week, not less, but more than ever on the Sabbath, when other forms of work give it the right of way. But some one asks, "Does not the Bible instance the resting of God on the seventh day of the creation week as a reason why we should also rest each seventh day?" Certainly it does, and we should be careful that we rest not only at God's time, but in God's way. As to his time, it is not necessary to suppose that God's original Sabbath was one of our little days of twenty-four hours. The word "day" is used at least once in the Genesis story for a longer period (Gen. 2: 4). It is elsewhere stated that "a day with the Lord is as a thousand years" (II. Peter 3: 8). As we imitate God's goodness in our smaller human way, so we may think of creation as a week of divine days, in six of which God completed his creative work among minerals, vegetables and animals, not one creation among which is known to have been added since then, and on the seventh turned for rest by change to redemptive works of mercy, mingled with works of necessity, the maintenance of world housekeeping.

Let us rise out of childish views of Sabbath keeping as not doing this or that, and learn that the subtlest, deepest rest comes to us through change from selfish work among minerals, vegetables, and animals on other days, to redemptive works of mercy on the Lord's Day. The "mineral kingdom," with its endless clank of money, the "vegetable kingdom," with its urgent question, "What shall we eat?" and the "animal kingdom" in us, as well as about us, with its lusts of the flesh, let us leave all these behind, and for one day each week breathe the higher air of unselfish work for man in the spiritual kingdom, where we have lofty fellowships with God and angels, to whom we are akin on the upper side of our human lives. Aye, that is Sabbath re-creation indeed to "enter the kingdom of God," not for idleness, but in the glad activities of love for God and man.

II. How Jesus, the Son of God, kept the Sabbath. Christ wrought miracles of healing on eight different Sabbaths, in eight different sections of Palestine, not because the sick one was in any case at the point of death, but to teach the Parisees and everybody else that the Sabbath is not kept by doing nothing, but by doing good. Let no one confuse the Pharisaic Sabbath of petty doubting, with the Sabbath God gave the Jews. The Fourth Commandment that God wrote in stone in token of everlastingness, says to man: "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work." This, as interpreted by Christ, means "thy work" for gain, "thy selfish" activities, and only such work is to cease on the "seventh day," while "works of mercy and necessity" go on every day.

In this story, while Christ made the healing teach us to do good on the Sabbath, he doubtless bade the sick man carry his rug bed to show that works of necessity are also allowed, by which is meant in law and gospel, household work of "bed and board," beyond which the word "necessity" can seldom be extended without bringing into the Sabbath unmerciful work that robs someone needlessly of their God-given right to rest. Even the courts rule that a real or fancied "necessity" to make money cannot be accepted as making any work a "work of necessity," in the sense in which that term is used to define exceptions to the law forbidding work on the Sabbath. Because Jesus healed on the Sabbath, the Pharisees called him a Sabbath breaker, more literally a Sabbath destroyer. He was indeed a destroyer of the Pharisaic, man-made, do-nothing Sabbath. Just as a shipbuilder breaks the barnacles off a ship that are no real part of it, but a hindrance, so Christ broke the Pharisaic Sabbath off of the true Sabbath. When the writer was in Palestine, the once-healing pool of Bethesda was half filled with rubbish, but this has since been removed, and it is now again filled with cleansing and thirst-slaking waters. So Christ dug out the Pharisaic rubbish of petty rules by which the true Sabbath's refreshment had been buried out of sight, and restored to men this fountain of youth at which we may weekly "renew our strength." The Sabbath is indeed an intermittent healing spring, by which weary ones who bathe are restored to strength every week. Be it ours to help those to enter its healing waters who are prevented, not by palsy but by greed for gain and greed for pleasures in themselves, or in others. "Sin no more," is the word of Christ to many whose strength of body or of soul, has been lost by Sabbath-breaking. O sickly, weary, wicked race of man, "wilt thou be made whole?" Then turn from the dissipations of a Sabbath profaned to the divine re-creation of a Christlike Sabbath.

Let me bring together here a group of stories illustrating not only Sabbath observance, but the sterling quality of missionary converts, who put some of us to shame by their fidelity in Sabbath keeping under difficulties. One Sunday evening a naval officer on the British ship Pheasant, which was lying off British Alaska, said to his associates in jest, "Let's go ashore and hear the band." They landed, and, to their astonishment, heard a b

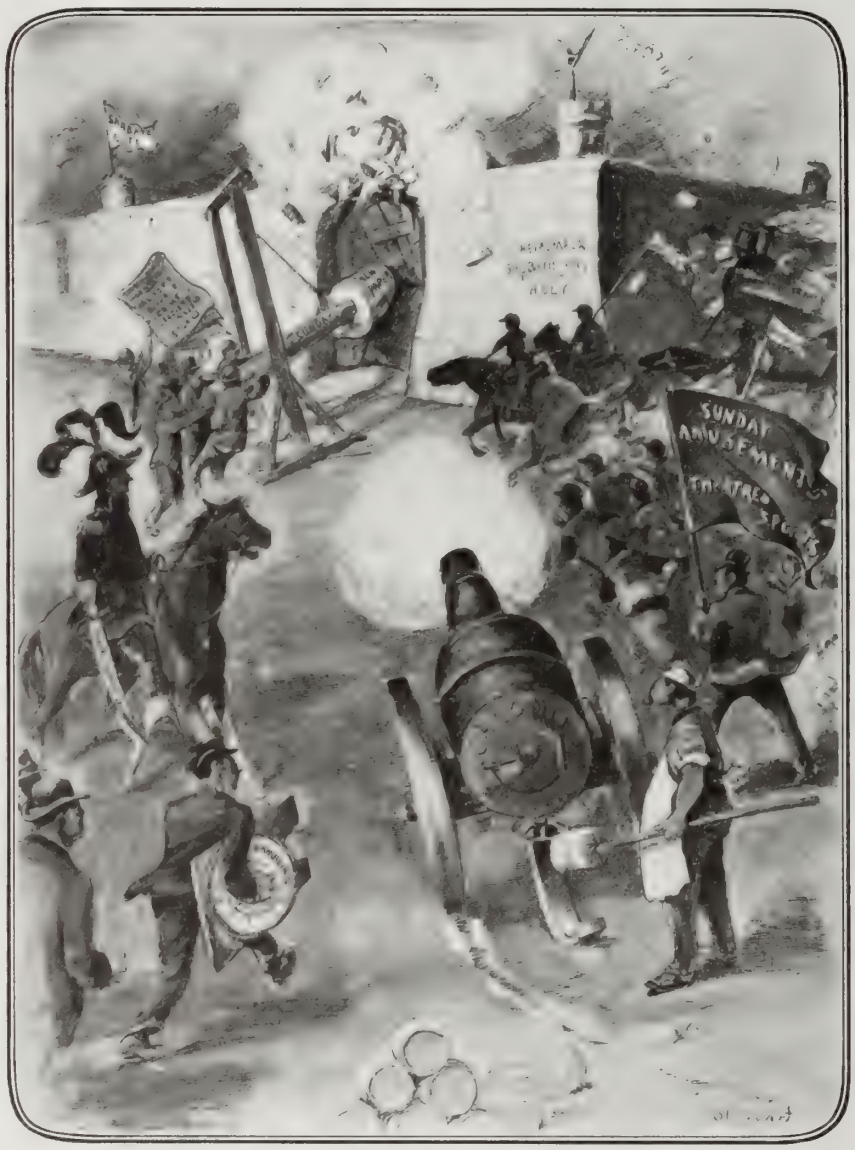
With these missionary incidents le us place one of the many exemplary acts of Sabbath observance by Emperor William II. Once when he was in Venice, they planned to give Lohengrin at the theatre, and invited him to occupy the royal box, but when he found they had selected Sunday night, he wrote to the manager: "From the time I ascended the throne I have never attended a Sunday performance, and what I do in Germany I must do abroad."

But let us not forget that the very heart of this lesson is, that while work for gain must stop one day, work for God and man is to go on every day. Let each soul be a daily fountain of life to all around.



THE AMERICAN SABBATH BOMBARDED BY ITS ENEMIES

The bread that bringeth strength I want to give;
The water pure that bids the thirsty live;
I want to help the fainting day by day:
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give to others hope and faith;
I want to do all that the Master saith;
I want to live aright from day to day;
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

Entirely Satisfied

I have been a regular subscriber for your paper for years, and have nearly always received a premium. And I have always been entirely satisfied. Your last premium, Good Manners for all Occasions, every young person should read and study. I am nearly eighty years old, and I wish such a book could have been put into my hands in the past. The calendar is indeed very beautiful.

Girls' Ideals

GIRLS cannot keep their ideals too high. A girl cannot afford to compromise with her conscience, nor to do evil that good may come. If, for instance, a girl feels that a certain course of action, or a given amusement is wrong, she should not let herself be persuaded to lower her standard. It is wrong for her, if her conscience pricks her with disapproval.

In their intercourse with their boy friends, young girls should let it be seen that they expect courtesy, good manners, and gentleness as a matter of course. A lad thinks no more of a girl for permitting him to be rude in her presence. She should not make an intimate friend of a youth who uses profane language, or frequents low company. A girl often fancies that her mission in life is to reform a young man who drinks, or gambles, or otherwise breaks the decalogue. Never was there a greater mistake. Unless the young man be her brother, or her near kinsman, a girl has no responsibility concerning him. A sister should, and must do all in her power to save her brother; but even she can do more by way of prevention than by way of cure.

Girls write, asking if they are justified in becoming engaged to men who drink "not very often to excess, but merely moderately." One such letter lies at my side as I talk to you now. The answer is this: If a man only once has so far forgotten himself as to drink to that extent which means debauchery, the great probability is that he will do so again, and soon. Every such excess will lead to another. The path of the so-called moderate drinker is a straight path to inebriety. Whatever a young girl may think, unless she wants to share a drunkard's life, she must not marry a man to reform him. Let him reform before he asks her to share his home, and bear his name.

Amy ——— was a beautiful neighbor of mine some years ago. As she and all her people are dead, I can tell you her story. She was courted by John ———, a rising lawyer, a young man of superb talents and fine manners. He belonged to an old and aristocratic family, and had carried off honors at the University. But John was convivial in his temperament and habits, and had no principles to guide him so far as temperance was concerned. He said, arrogantly, that neither man or woman should interfere with his personal liberty. When his engagement to Amy was announced, many people, friends of both, shook their heads. One friend went to her and remonstrated, begging her, before it should be too late, to withdraw from her bargain.

"I love John," said Amy, "with all my heart and soul. I would marry him if every friend and relative I have in the world should oppose the match. I would marry him if he were intoxicated on our wedding day. Even then my love would save him."

Wilful and determined, she did what she promised. She and John were married, and a more brilliant wedding was never celebrated. Seven years later, after incalculable misery, John committed suicide under mental aberration, and Amy, broken-hearted, the shadow of her former bright self, kept on in her widowhood, as she had for a large part of her married life, working to support herself and her two children.

Girls, you owe it to yourselves, to the parents who have brought you up, and to the community, not only to have noble ideals yourselves, to live in sweetness and purity, but to exact the same nobility from the men you may marry.

The Commitment of Juvenile Offenders

Although a great deal has been done recently to ameliorate the treatment of youthful delinquents, particularly of those who have been arrested and are waiting trial, yet there are abuses which need a remedy. A boy brought before a magistrate for a misdemeanor wholly unintentional, should not be thrown into prison, locked in a cell, or brought to the bar with other criminals, unless the occasion for this is very great. An example, given in a recent daily paper, shows the injustice that may be done a child through the mulish obstinacy of a man who is lacking in sensitiveness, or obeys orders without intelligence. A little fellow, the son of a widowed mother, on his way to work, lost his transfer. He had paid his nickel on car No. 1, but in car No. 2 the needful scrap of paper to convey him forward was lacking. A man in the car, a fellow-passenger, gave the boy his transfer, and presumably walked the rest of the way to his own objective point. Had he paid the boy's fare, all would have been well, but the singular feature of the transaction was this: The inspector who witnessed the affair arrested the boy and haled him to a police court, while the man, who was the older transgressor, went free. Against the protests of the magistrate, the inspector insisted on pressing his complaint, and the boy went to a cell. The loss probably of his position, the blow to his self-respect, and the companionship with law-breakers into which he was thrown, were all unfortunate results of this incident.

Too much care cannot be taken to avoid the arrest and commitment of children. They are usually more sinned against than sinning, and in their case an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure.

WASHING CLOTHES ON THE ICE

This little scene has its bit of comfort for American housekeepers. These notable Holland dames, who do not mind the ice half as much as we do, are washing their clothes out of doors, on a bleak but sunshiny day. Our steam-heated laundries and washing machines are a great improvement on their methods.

Her Linen Closet

THE contents of her linen closet are especially dear to the heart of the notable housekeeper. With a delight that is thoroughly feminine, she surveys the piles of sheets, pillow-slips and bed-spreads, the table-cloths and napkins which are peculiarly her own property. Forming as they do, the bride's contribution to the new home, they remain throughout her life the wife's pride and joy.

Fine cotton sheets are as desirable as those of pure linen and are preferred by many, as being warmer than the latter. Each bed-room in a well ordered home has its separate provision of sheets, towels, pillow-slips, spreads and blankets. When the stock begins to wear out, or rather before it begins to show signs of age, the thrifty woman replenishes it, adding each season or each year, as she conveniently can, to the sheets for her large double-beds, for her three-quarter and her single beds. It is poor management that jumbles together promiscuously the several kinds and sizes of sheets and towels, and she is not a good economist who does not bring scrutiny and supervision to bear upon her household linen.

I have known women who excelled in the fine art of mending linen, and whose dainty stitches sufficed to give a new lease to the best table-cloth when it showed thin places here and there. It is obvious that careless laundry work and an injudicious resort to cleansing chemicals which rot the thread, cause our linen to give out too soon. Great care in washing and ironing will add a long time to the fine linen that it breaks one's heart to part with.

Hemstitched sheets and pillow-slips are much admired, but they are apt to break in the hem sooner than if they are merely folded over and hemmed. A sheet for a single bed should be of width sufficient to fold over and hang down at each side, and of length that allows for generous tucking in at the bottom. Equally, a double-bed requires a sheet much wider than itself, and of generous length.

Table-linen may be extremely plain or very ornamental. Lace and insertion are permitted at present on fine table cloths. But the real elegance is in the linen itself, and if a cloth be of fine fabric, rich weave, and that satiny lustre that has the sheen of silk, it ought to satisfy the taste of the most fastidious house-mistress.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

MARY LOUISE. Do not think so much about yourself. If you want to be happy, you must "look out and not in."

E. V. A fruit course is often the first served at a luncheon. Grape fruit, oranges or white grapes, are nice at this season. Follow this with small oysters on the half-shell. Then serve bouillon in small cups. Chops, with peas and potatoes. A salad, dessert and coffee will complete a very acceptable menu.

MOTHER. Tired as you are with the care of your active children, when you feel like complaining, stop and ask yourself, "Which one could I spare?"

THIN GIRL. You probably wear yourself out by too much emotion about trifles. I advise you to give up coffee and tea for awhile and drink cocoa or milk instead.

A Literary Banquet

Accept my sincere thanks for the beautiful premiums I have received. The Calendar is very beautiful; the Crown Dictionary exceeds any I have ever consulted in giving clear and distinct definitions; this, with my Crown Encyclopedia, form a most valuable set of books, while the Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts are a literary feast and banquet combined. Outwardly as well as inwardly, they are grand and beautiful.

THE HEART OF THE WORLD

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF OPENING CHAPTERS

Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., of the aristocratic St. Cecilia Metropolitan Church, is a pastor with broad humanitarian views of life. He has found time amid the duties of his ministry to write a book, entitled, The Christian Socialist, which has just been published under the nom de plume of "Mark Burns." It excites a tremendous sensation. His secret of the authorship is known only to Miss Mildred Rodney, his betrothed, who has divined it. The book excites mingled praise and antagonism, and is the topic of the hour. The conservative element denounce it as dangerous to society. Judge Rodney is especially bitter. Next winter, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton is chosen as bishop. A distinguished audience assembles in St. Cecilia's, to witness the consecration. At the critical moment, the pastor makes an open avowal of the authorship of the offending book. Bishops, clerics, and audience are stricken dumb with amazement. His ecclesiastical career is regarded as ended. Miss Rodney, notwithstanding some parental opposition, consents to marry Stanton, and the two begin to face the world together bravely.

Meanwhile, a great strike is going on at Lenox, and Stanton is invited to address the Union men, by Bruce Harvey, their president. He advocates Christian love and forbearance, instead of violence, but the meeting is stampeded by the news of a riot at the mills. Stanton and Harvey go there with the crowd, but cannot preserve order. In the riot several are killed and many injured. Stanton rescues a poor negro worker from the furious mob, but is himself badly hurt in doing so. He and Harvey become fast friends. Harwood, and Wrightam are two millionaire mill owners, whose hard and oppressive measures have embittered the workers. Stanton resolves to plead with them for a better understanding, as both are church members and professing Christians. He calls on Wrightam, but meets with a decided rebuff. With Harwood he has more success, and the two become good friends. Harwood has a great domestic sorrow, which takes the sweetness out of all his business triumphs. He leaves his wealthy home and friends, and disguised, goes to work as a mill-hand.

Stanton meanwhile is becoming well known as an advocate of Christian Socialism, and is a frequent lecturer. He meets many queer characters among the workers, and much appreciation. The troubles at Lenox continue, and he arrives there one day just in time to find a mob about to burn a negro who is accused of murder. Stanton determines to thwart the lynchers, but is knocked senseless, and the negro is burned. Next day the real culprits are found, and the negro victim is shown to have been wholly innocent. There is a popular revulsion of feeling in favor of Stanton. On the following Sunday he preaches in one of the leading pulpits, by invitation, and takes the lynching for his topic. Some people in the audience take exception to certain remarks by the speaker, as unpatriotic, and there is a momentary interruption, during which many leave the hall. Stanton then quietly concludes his discourse. While visiting the Company's mill, Stanton witnesses a heroic act by a worker, who saves Harvey's life by imperiling his own. He recognizes the worker as Harwood. Harwood dies of his injuries, and Harvey, an hour later, learns the true story of his heroic rescue. Harvey, on recovering, seeks Stanton's society and counsel, and is apparently deeply interested in religion. His interest, however, is wholly superficial. He soon resents Stanton's influence with the workers, and demands that Stanton's evangelistic labors among them should cease. On Stanton's refusal to comply, Harvey, in a passion, strikes his friend. The latter accepts the assault in silence, forbearing to retaliate. Soon afterward, the two are reconciled.

Stanton's preaching at Saint Cecilia, where he is laboring by special invitation, touches Wrightam's conscience. He sends a messenger for Stanton, who finds the usually hard-hearted money-maker under deep conviction. Mrs. Wrightam declares her astonishment and incredulity at the change.

"IT is a miracle, madam," Stanton said, looking at her steadily. "In that room to-night your husband is confronting superhuman powers. He is waging the soul battle of the ages. It is my prayer that God will win for him, as I believe he will."

She looked back at Stanton, and then, without speaking, laughed again, and moved towards the door. At that instant, Eileen came down the stairs, and seeing her mother and Dr. Stanton, paused on the last step.

"Where is father?" she inquired, suppressing a yawn.

"He is in the 'den,' and I am going in to see what is the matter," her mother answered. "Mr. Stanton, you are interfering where you have no right," she exclaimed, haughtily. "I shall do as I please in this matter. What you have said is simply absurd. Eileen, Mr. Stanton says Mr. Wrightam is passing through a religious experience! I believe he is excited over these vulgar revival meetings, and possibly worried over the effect of them on the men."

"Madam," said Stanton, remaining where he first stood when Mrs. Wrightam came downstairs, "I have no authority in this house. But I most sincerely believe, that if you go in there now, you will be guilty of an intrusion so great that the result of it may not be measured by eternity. There are some experiences in a man's life so sacred, that not even his most intimate relatives have a right to witness them."

He spoke so earnestly, withal, in so calm and dignified a manner, that even, woman as she was, she felt impressed. Still, her purpose was unchanged, and, after an instant of indecision, she stepped again towards the door. At that moment Alfred came into the hall, out of the library, which adjoined Wrightam's "den."

"Mother," he said hurriedly, "What's the matter with father? I thought a moment ago I heard him groan. Mr. Stanton," he continued, seeing the minister for the first time, "What is the matter with——"

"I am going in to see," Mrs. Wrightam exclaimed, and her hand was on the knob, when the door was opened by her husband.

The look on Wrightam's face was one Stanton will never forget. The fear was gone. In the place of it was a look of redemption that made Stanton's heart leap up.

Mrs. Wrightam had stepped back when the door opened so suddenly. Next instant she cried out, "John, what is the matter? Why have you shut yourself up so all day?"

He did not appear to see her or to hear her. Quietly he spoke to Stanton, "Will you come back in here, Dr. Stanton?" Then he seemed suddenly to be conscious of the presence of his wife.

"Amy, I wish to be with Dr. Stanton a few moments. I am not ill. I will——"

He looked at his wife with an expression she had never seen in his face before, and the next moment he had gently drawn Stanton into the room and shut the door.

Mrs. Wrightam paused a moment, as if minded to disregard her husband's wishes; but finally she turned and beckoned Eileen and Alfred to go upstairs with her.

"Your father is not himself," she said to Eileen, as they entered the upstairs drawing-room. "I fully agree with Mrs. Rodney, that Dr. Stanton is a dangerous man. If J. B. should once get led away by his socialistic theories——"

"But there's no danger of that, mother," Eileen replied in astonishment.

"I don't know what to think of J. B's. conduct today," Mrs. Wrightam said petulantly. "Of course, I don't believe your father will ever do anything so foolish. Let me know, Alfred, the minute Mr. Stanton goes out."

She went into her room, and Eileen and Alfred continued to discuss the conduct of their father, and give some reason for it.

Yet not even their most extravagant imagination for one moment approached the wonderful truth. J. B. Wrightam, the modern captain of industry, the trust promoter, the financial magnate, the commercial highwayman, who gambled in millions as other men gambled in hundreds, had been born again and was a new man in Christ Jesus. The Carpenter of Nazareth had measured power again with the demoniac, and Wrightam was sitting clothed and in his right mind. He had come to himself, and for the first time since his prodigal riot and beggary among the swine he said, "I will arise and go to my Father."

As the door had closed behind them, Stanton, realizing even through the mystery of it what had occurred, grasped Wrightam's hand.

"Thank God, Brother Wrightam!"

"I can scarcely realize, Mr. Stanton, what has happened. But of one thing I am certain. From this time forth Jesus Christ is my Master. O Brother Stanton, tell me what I must do. Show me how to make my discipleship known!"

It was the old cry of Paul repeated, twenty centuries later—"Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" It was the martyr cry of the ages, longing to make restitution in evidence of its honest faith.

"There is much to say on that point, Brother Wrightam. Do you realize yet what it means to be a Christian?"

"I suppose not. One thing, however, is very clear to me, as I said. If Christ is my Master, my future cannot be anything like my past. All things have become new."

Stanton looked at him as one might look at a man who had suddenly walked out of a grave where he had been buried forty-five years.

"Of course, you understand the Christian life means——"

"Confession," interupted Wrightam promptly. "Public confession. I am all ready to make it, Brother Stanton," he spoke with tears in his eyes, the first Stanton had ever seen there. "No one can understand the joy it will be to me to confess my Lord."

"Your family——"

Across Wrightam's face a look of great and wo[r]ful emotion passed.

"I must tell my wife and children. But how [th]they understand——"

For just an instant the old look of fear was [o]face, then it was succeeded by the divine peace [th]knows no fear.

"Of course, your business, the other members [o]mill company, the men, the——"

"It will all have to be changed, it cannot go on [o]old life, the old practices. The whole of it mu[st] made new."

"Do you comprehend, Brother Wrightam, how [d]ficult it will be for you to readjust your business [a]tions with the other men who are still unchris[t] Are you ready to face——"

"I am ready to face anything for my Saviour," [s]Wrightam, like a child.

For a moment Stanton did not venture to breal[k] silence.

Wrightam got up and began to pace the room.

"This is a wonderful thing that has happened t[o] Stanton. I don't cheat myself by thinking it is [h]notism or any thing of that sort. I had an exper[i]in here while you were out of the room that I [c]relate even to you. It was real, and it was sane a[s] was true. But it was supernatural. I saw all my [l]life, in all its hideous, unrelieved selfishness. It [h]not one redeeming quality. It was ghastly in its [n]ganism. As I cowered under it, I seemed to be [c]ered into a perfect hell of condemnation. A fear s[o] me, so great that what I felt when you came in [t]was nothing in comparison. For a few momen[ts] suffered all the tortures of hell. I believe if any [o]had entered the room during those moments, even [G]or my wife, I would have tried to shake off that [h]ror, and in my madness have driven the Spirit of [G]forever out of my soul. But when those mom[en]passed, I was permitted, by the grace of God, to [s]eternal forgiveness in the face of Christ." The t[r]rolled over Wrightam's coarse face, glorified now [w]his unearthly experience. "What I saw I cannot [de]scribe, not even to you, Brother Stanton, but I [s]never forget it. The most distinct, real, joyful exp[e]ence of my entire life was that moment when the [v]of God said to me, 'Your sins are forgiven.' It [s]seemed to me that I have been alone for several d[a]What is the time?"

He suddenly took out his watch. Stanton mech[a]ically took out his, also.

"Only half past eleven! Do you believe in miracl[es]"

"I believe in the miracle of regeneration," said S[t]ton softly.

"It is wonderful! wonderful! My Jesus I love t[hee] I know thou art mine," Wrightam murmured. "[An]old hymn was the last one sung in Saint Ce[cil]that evening. To hear Wrightam repeat the wo[rds] to see the love-light of the crucified Son of God in [the]greed-hardened eyes, was like viewing the uns[ee]glory of the dying robber on the Cross.

Wrightam continued his walk a few moments. T[hen] he came up close to Stanton and said, gently, "[Be]fore you go, pray for me. I shall need all the stren[gth] I can get for this new life."

The two kneeled. Stanton's voice faltered in the f[irst] sentence, then went on, strong and joyful. As he pray[ed] the very air seemed pulsing with the Divine presen[ce] the Holy Spirit pervaded the room, and Stanton kn[ew] that Wrightam was conscious of that eternal fact w[ith] him. The knowledge charged his petition and fram[ed] his appeal for the new life that now kneeled beside h[im]

When he finished, before he had time to ask Wrig[ht]am to pray also, the converted mill owner began in [a] broken, but utterly childlike prayer, that brought s[o] to Stanton's breast, and drove away the last faint l[in]gering doubt lest the regeneration of Wrightam mi[ght] be fictitious. No unsaved man could have prayed li[ke] that. The physical and mental difficulty in the way [of] such a man as Wrightam offering a prayer was son[e] thing tremendous. But, that was nothing by the s[ide] of the spiritual lack, which such a man as Wright[am] had always known. The very sound of his simp[le] beseeching, halting, but truthful petition for Go[d's] help, touched Stanton more than he had been touch[ed] in the case of Johnny Parr, the gambler. The t[wo] cases were not alike, except in the similar work of t[he] construction which the Holy Spirit had wrought in t[he] two men.

In the pause after Wrightam's prayer, again th[e] pervasive, subtle, but strong and exhilarating reality

A Bed at Night, A Davenport by Day

A Marvel in Household Furniture for Beauty, Comfort and Usefulness.

The Bullard costs only a little more than the common iron cot that makes neither a davenport nor a good bed.

Can be folded or extended in ten seconds as only three operations are required to fold in a sofa or make into a davenport. Made of brass, wood and steel, therefore strictly sanitary.

You are always ready for unexpected guests.

Bullard Bed-Davenport as Davenport

When a davenport, it is suitable for the parlor of the most luxurious homes. It has an exceptionally high-grade hinged mattress; the outside covering on both sides is fancy cretonne. This specially made mattress makes a soft, rich appearing davenport cushion and is the regulation size mattress by night.

We finish the Bullard Bed-Davenport in a dead black, robin egg blue, wine or mahogany, willow green, white, sea green and pea green.

We ship the Bullard Bed-Davenport on thirty days' trial; if not satisfactory, full amount refunded and no objections raised. Our price is delivered.

Write for a catalogue that illustrates and tells all about the Bullard Bed-Davenport as a bed dressed, a davenport draped and samples of the mattress cretonne and the color cards of the bed finished.

the Divine presence thrilled them. How strange, that, in a world which has seen this miracle so often performed, men are still sceptical of the fact of the loving and living God! How sad, that, after the day of Pentecost has been recorded in human history, the Christian Church should be content with outward forms and ceremonies, and miss the glory of the supernatural, shut its eyes to the vision of that light that never was on sea or land!

The two rose to their feet and faced each other. Stanton's hand went out lovingly to rest on Wrightam's shoulder. Wrightam's words came with difficulty.

"I owe you everything. You have helped me to the Cross. Men do not thank one another for such a thing as this. I have been a very sinful man. How sinful only God knows. But I don't doubt his forgiveness. Before him, Stanton, I want the rest of my life to be a witness for restitution and repentance, even if it brings me to the Cross on which my Saviour died. Pray for me, won't you? I cannot meet it alone."

"IT IS A MIRACLE, MADAM," SAID STANTON, LOOKING AT HER STEADILY

Stanton promised, moved to the depths by the great event, and went out into the hall. As he opened the front door, he saw Mrs. Wrightam coming down the stairs again. He waited a moment, thinking she had spoken his name, but she did not even look at him as she came slowly down the stairs. Eileen and Alfred were behind their mother, also coming down with her, for the purpose of seeing their father. Stanton's glimpse of the three compelled a vision of their interview with Wrightam, and the dramatic outcome of that scene fascinated his imagination all the way home.

The first words Mildred uttered were: "Is it true? Has Mr. Wrightam really been converted?"

"By the grace of God, I believe he has, Mildred. But has any one told you?"

"No, Fredrick. But all the time you have been gone, it has seemed to me that the presence of the Holy Spirit was so real it filled all Lenox. What a wonderful event! What will be the result of Mr. Wrightam's conversion?"

"I don't believe any one can tell. If he is really a Christian, as I believe he is, the fact may change the entire history of Lenox. Meanwhile, he has a tremendous cross to carry in the effort he will make to explain his change of life to his wife and children, and readjust his business relations and put them on a Christian basis."

"Oh, Fredrick, will he do that? Do you really think he will succeed in making Mrs. Wrightam, Eileen and Alfred understand his new life? Mother used to know Mrs. Wrightam when she was Mrs. Lynde. I have heard mother say that her divorce was altogether wicked. This is a great deal for mother to say. But how will such a woman ever understand or accept the change in Mr. Wrightam's life? I can hardly believe that such a change has taken place. Are you sure of the fact?"

"I believe there is no question as to the fact. It is one of the miracles of the ages. It has occurred to reveal to this sinful city the superhuman life. The raising of Lazarus was not a greater revelation of God's power, than the change that has taken place in this Mammon worshiper."

When Mrs. Wrightam entered the "den" that night she was angry with several people. She was angry with her husband, because of his unexplained absence and his church attendance that day. She was angry at Stanton, because of his part in the revival meetings among the mill men, and his possible influence over Wrightam. She was angry at Alfred, her son, for disobeying her command not to go to Dr. Stanton's that evening, at his father's request. At the bottom of her resentment at the Stanton's, rankled a bitterness towards Mrs. Rodney, who had never forgiven her scandal of divorce and never accepted her leadership of Lenox society.

She came into the room with her head up, her children silently following. Wrightam was standing in the middle of the room. The exaltation of the vision he had experienced pervaded his whole person; the love-light of the crucified Son of God was still in his eyes.

"J. B., what is the matter? Why have you been with Mr. Stanton all this time? What have you been doing? You have neglected me shamefully!"

Wrightam put out his hand, and placed it on his wife's shoulder. I think the man had really loved his wife a little. At any rate, he had been proud of her good looks, and he adorned her person as he might have decorated a favorite horse.

"Amy," he said gently, "I wonder if you can understand. I am a Christian. I am a new man in Christ."

"A Christian!" The simple, sudden announcement affected her strangely. Her face flushed angrily and she stepped back.

"Do you mean that this socialist, anarchist preacher, has deluded you with his quack religion?"

"It means, Amy, that I am no longer the same. I am a different man. The whole world is changed to me." He continued looking over her head as she confronted him erect, exasperated, astonished, rapidly forecasting the effect on her future. Wrightam suddenly began to sing:

My Jesus I love the,
I know thou art mine,
For thee all the follies
Of sin I resign;
My gracious Redeemer,
My Saviour art thou
If ever I loved thee,
My Jesus, 'tis now.

She listened as a tigress might listen to a mother singing an evening lullaby to her babe.

"Leave the room Eileen, Alfred!" she stamped her foot as she spoke. "I want to talk to your father alone!" The children went out overwhelmed by what they had heard. Mrs. Wrightam turned to face her husband, and he, as if for the first time fully conscious of the family crisis that confronted him, returned her look as she stood there alert, profoundly angered, the jewels he had given her gleaming at her throat and on her fingers, the incarnation of the world in its lust for the pleasures that pass away before the breath of the eternal God.

CHAPTER X

THE moment the door had shut behind Alfred and Eileen, Mrs. Wrightam exclaimed: "I suppose one of the 'follies of sin' you are going to resign is your wife. She will hardly be good enough for you now."

"Amy," her husband went nearer to her. He spoke earnestly, but calmly. His whole attitude was that of appeal. "You do not understand. My entire purpose in life is changed. But I never had a greater longing to be true to those I love. I have lived a very sinful life. We have both been deeply guilty."

"Speak for yourself J. B.!" she uttered the words contemptuously. She was enraged at the unexpected event. She saw, in her shrewdness, the crumbling of her social fabric so painfully erected. For this divine interruption, this astounding transformation of her husband, she had nothing but hatred, so far as she understood it. Wrightam walked to the end of the room, and came back again.

"Amy, I do not deceive myself, and I cannot deceive you in the matter. The change wrought in me by the grace of God will compel me to change almost every habit of my life."

"What do you mean?" She turned upon him savagely, anticipating to some extent his answer.

"My business affairs. I have, as an individual and a member of a corporation, repeatedly broken the law of the State and of God's higher Kingdom. I cannot do this any longer."

"Do you mean that you will retire from the business of the mills?" she asked sharply. During this interview her whole physical appearance had seemed to age before his eyes. The lines of her face had hardened, the beauty of her features had taken on a look of repulsion. Or was it because he now saw her for the first time as she really was?

"I shall retire from it if I cannot change its methods. Plainly, Amy, all these years I have been a gambler, a thief, and a worshiper of Mammon. The fact that I have held a place in society, and have been allowed to go my ways outside of the penitentiary, does not alter the fact that I have been guilty, on a stupendous scale, of wickedness which has resulted in conviction and imprisonment for scores of men who have robbed the people of smaller amounts. In the sight of God I am guilty. I cannot continue this sort of life. If to change it means—"

"If it means the giving up of all the things worth having, do you mean to follow that course?" his wife almost shrieked in her anger. Her shrewd forecast was not far from the knowledge of the facts.

"If it means the giving up of anything that has broken God's laws and hindered the growth of his Kingdom, I am ready to give it up."

"But I am not! You are reckoning without me! Do you imagine I intend to let go my social ambitions, to adopt a life of sentimental fanaticism, to take up with a foolish, dangerous anarchism like Mr. Stanton teaches, to lose my hold on the things I need for my life, all on account of a mistaken religious excitement? Do you think I will accept such a dreary programme of existence? I will not for one moment. I will not live such a life, and I will not accept the terms of such a union!"

"Amy, what do you mean?"

"I mean, J. B., that I will leave you rather than live the life you propose. I will not, and cannot, endure such an existence as I foresee. My whole life depends on the possession of money and social power. I will not forego them for any dream of men like Mr. Stanton or Bruce Harvey. J. B., this is an illusion you are under. These meetings are exciting. You have in some way come under the spell of them. Shake it off. Are you J. B. Wrightam, the great captain of industry, the man who holds Lenox finances in his hands, the daring leader of great enterprises which have astonished the industrial world, or are you a poor, fanatical convert to a sentiment which was never intended for a practical world; a weak, useless theoretical vision of a dreamer who lived centuries ago——"

"Amy, I cannot listen to that. You must be silent." He spoke in stress of agony for her and himself. She had come close to him, and her appeal, while pagan in its coarse, brutal confession of her paganism, had nevertheless shaken him. She had possessed a certain fascination for him. The vision he now had of his future was that of a narrow way, at the ending of which stood a large black cross. The few significant words his wife had uttered about leaving him, threw up at once the veil before a future, disgraced by social scandal which now, under the finer impulses that moved him, was simply torture. The social and business revolution he was contemplating was nothing short of stupendous in its effects on all the surroundings of his existence, as it involved with him his family, his business associates and his acquaintances. The woman who now faced him, his children who were wondering at this experience of their father, were the products of such a false and selfish social environment as he had helped to create. What else could come out of it except what did come? There was no anger in his heart towards this woman. A deep-growing pity was moving him. Nevertheless, he saw everything now in its true light. And at the heart of it all was his Divine Lord, who beckoned him calmly to follow him. "If any man will not deny himself and take up his cross and follow me, he cannot be my disciple." The words kept repeating themselves in a rhythmic refrain while his wife was talking.

"Amy, you know not what you say. This dreamer of twenty centuries ago is the one great Person in my life at this moment. I believe in Him as I believe in no other being on earth."

RESCUE WORK IN CHINA'S "CITY OF BOATS"

THERE is probably no place in the world where sin has stranger aspects than in Canton, the Chinese "City of Boats," where a million human beings live on the water. Until mission work was commenced there, vice held unrestricted sway. Young girls were traded like so much merchandise. Bands of pirates ran riot, plundering and murdering. So little human love and kindness known there, the little children were allowed to drown, if they had fallen in the water, in sight of men able to save them. God was unknown among these people, and they were entirely ruled by ignorance and superstition. Fathers believed their daughters to be commodities of so much value, according to success in bargaining, and even mothers were callous to their daughters' fate, while the girls themselves were trained to the idea that they had no other lot in life. Through ignorance, also, no man would save a fellow-being from death, in the superstitious belief that it was the fate of the unfortunate one.

Such were the hideous aspects of vice when missionary work spread its influence over the waters of the beautiful bay of Canton. The work of redemption is progressing encouragingly. Already some remarkable changes have been accomplished by the Gospel. Rescue work amongst girls is being pursued in accordance with the same methods that are followed by the missionaries in other parts of China. It is largely preventative. The girls are saved before they can be sold into lives of sin and sent to rescue homes. Step by step, the moral horizon of the Chinese under-folk is being widened, and they are gradually gaining a knowledge of the truths of Christianity.

While visiting Canton and walking along the beautiful park-like terraces of the Sumeen, or European concession, one day, the writer, accompanied by a guide, stepped into a sampan (or river boat) and was soon gliding along the canal in the direction of the bay. On one side of the canal was the dingy, dirty old city of Canton, and on the other the broad esplanades which fronted the beautiful European colony. The sampan was covered by a canopy of bamboo, beneath which we sat on a low, wooden seat covered with matting. Matting was on the floor, and the boat, from stem to stern, was scrupulously clean. A young sampan girl and her mother, who were the rowers, had both taken the oars and were paddling the boat like a canoe with surprising speed. It was amazing to watch the dexterity with which they steered through the mass of traffic, most of which consisted of sampans, with occasional junks and barges carrying merchandise. Everyone in the latter was heavily armed with cannon of the oldest description and with ancient blunderbuses. This was evidence, if any were needed, of the dread in which pirates are held by these people.

CANTON "SAMPAN" GIRLS WHO HAVE BEEN RESCUED BY MISSIONARIES

The elder woman in our boat was in the middle years of life, yet, strangely enough, as she told the guide, she had never walked on the earth. Like thousands of others, she had been born and raised in a sampan, and had never experienced the desire or necessity to tread on dry land. Her husband was a water-coolie working on one of the many barges which passed us on each side, and they owned a fishing junk somewhere in the bay. The sons were married and lived on the junk with their own families, coming often to see their parents, for whom they had the reverence which is so characteristic of the Chinese. Indeed, if any other proof were needed of the natural goodness of the Chinese character, it would be found in their respect and love of their parents. The girl, I was shocked to learn, had recently been sold by her parents to a ship's officer whose vessel traded between Canton and Hongkong. It is the fate of many of these helpless sampan girls, if not married when very young, to be sold either to Chinese or foreigners. The women of the flower boats are even more worldly than the simple creatures of the sampans. Mission-workers have already done much to rescue girls from these resorts. A. G.

Your Last Chance To Learn Jiu-Jitsu FREE

If you do not already know that Jiu-Jitsu is the most wonderful system of physical training and self-defense in the world to-day, I invite you to write for my FREE LESSON and demonstrate this to your own satisfaction. But you must act promptly, as this offer will shortly be withdrawn.

It is to the persistent practice of Jiu-Jitsu that the Japanese owe their courage and success in battle, their almost superhuman strength and power of endurance, their low death rate and their material progress. Surely a system of physical training which has done so much for the Island Nation will interest YOU. Jiu-Jitsu not only embodies the ideal principles of attaining perfect health and perfect physical development, but as a means of self-defense it is as potent at short range as the deadliest weapon. A knowledge of its self-preserving principles renders a man or woman impregnable to every form of vicious attack.

Jealously Guarded Secrets Revealed

I have just written an intensely interesting book which explains and makes clear the principles of Jiu-Jitsu in a manner which will never be approached by any American writer. So long as the edition lasts, this book, together with my first lesson in Jiu-Jitsu, will be sent free to interested persons. The lesson is fully illustrated and teaches one of the most effective methods known for disposing of a dangerous antagonist.

If you desire to learn all the closely guarded secrets of this marvelous science, write me and you will receive the book and specimen lesson by return mail, postage paid. Address,

NEW METHOD CO.

We have sold all our trays and must say that they were a perfect success. Every one we asked to buy took one for they thought they were just beautiful, and so they were. That is the first large amount we ever cleared with so little labor. I took only evenings to do it in, but have no difficulty in disposing of them. We thank you very much and will be very glad you sent me. Some sold their ten so quickly, that they came for more a second and a third time. If you will furnish us with another plan for raising money I know it certainly was a success all through. I could have sold more such good methods. Let us know about them. The money from the TRAYS will be used to provide for an orphan our C. E. Society has adopted in India.

Enclosed you will find a check, and please accept our thanks for your help in raising the money.

Yours truly, Clara M. Coming

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A STORY OF THE TOILERS*

THIS book opens with the death of the character from whom it takes its name. Adam Clarke, an aged British workingman on his dying bed commands his wife and children to seek new opportunities in America after his death. The parting scene between the old husband and father, and the mother and children, is deeply pathetic, as Adam recalls his earlier life in his native Scotland, and the circumstances which brought him to his English home. He dies, and being a Nonconformist, as those who do not belong to the Established Church are known in England, his mortal part is denied burial in the parish churchyard, in which at the same time that Adam's coffin is borne to another burying-ground, are entombed, with much pomp and ceremony, the remains of the son of a neighboring squire, who had died a victim of his own dissipation.

The Clarke family emigrate to America. There are Hungarians on the same steamer with them, bound for the coal mines of Pennsylvania. One of these, named Horgwin, tries to kiss little Allie Clarke. This rudeness is rebuked and punished by a young Cornishman named Herbert Prynne, also bound for the Pennsylvania coal regions. The Clarkes are grateful to Prynne, who becomes the earnest admirer of Mary, the second daughter, and they agree, with the consent of Mrs. Clarke, to be married as soon as Herbert can provide a home for Mary.

The Clarkes arrive at Castle Garden, the landing-place for immigrants before the establishment of Ellis Island, and a life-like description is given of the "Garden," its motley occupants, and the abuses which prevailed there. Mrs. Clarke, her three daughters, Martha, Mary and Allie, and Wallace, the youngest son, go to Fall River, and obtain work in the cotton mills. A blacklisted and hounded operative seeks refuge with the Clarkes, and tells them of the maltreatment he and his family had to endure. The condition of the cotton mill workers is described, and some touching incidents related.

Robert and Alexander, the two older sons, are at work, meantime, in the rolling mills at Pittsburg. There they become acquainted with Andrew Craig, a fine young American of revolutionary ancestry, employed by the Pennsylvania Railway Company. The work of the rolling mill is described in interesting detail. Robert and Alexander send for their mother, sisters and Wallace just at the time that Herbert Prynne, now settled at Craddocksboro, and a foreman there in the coal mine, writes to Mary, begging her to come and be his wife.

Here the circumstances which led Prynne to send for Mary are of interest. Horgwin, the Hungarian, who had been thrashed by Prynne on the steamer coming from England for insulting Allie Clarke, attempts to murder Prynne by cutting the wire rope of the cage while Prynne is descending in it. Prynne escapes fatal injury, and supposes the breaking of the rope to have been accidental. While recovering, he becomes weary of his lonesomeness, and invites Mary to join him. She goes to Craddocksboro, and they are married. Conditions in the coal mining regions are graphically described, and the fire in the coal mine, when Prynne saves the lives of himself and his companions, makes a thrilling chapter.

In Pittsburg, Andrew Craig marries Martha, the oldest daughter of the Clarke family, and a baby boy comes to bless their home. Then Craig leads in the Pennsylvania railway strike, and his baby is killed in its mother's arms by the first fire of the militia. The scenes of the strike, the battle with the military, and firing of railway property, are pictured in words that bring the awful spectacle vividly before the reader. Craig, with the other strikers, is blacklisted by the railways, and can get no work. Martha, his wife, dies of starvation, and is buried with her child. Craig goes forth a wanderer, every door of employment shut to him by railway decree. At length he makes his way to Mexico, where the ban no longer follows him, and there he becomes independent, and accumulates a fortune.

Meantime the Clarkes also, although they had taken no part in the strike, are blacklisted on account of their relationship to Craig. They go to live in New York, where they struggle along in poverty, the sufferings of the New York poor being portrayed in this connection. An interesting incident of this part of the book is the admission, by mistake, to the pulpit of one of the wealthy New York churches, of the Rev. Jefferson Jones, a Western evangelist, who preaches a sermon full of holy wrath to the smug millionaires. A pathetic story is told of the death of young Allie Clarke, for want of the chicken broth which could not be prepared for her because the gas company had turned off the gas—which in New York is used for cooking—notwithstanding a touching appeal not to do so. Strikes, and the scenes of violence and disorder attending them, are described, and Andrew Craig, now a rich man, returns from Mexico in time to prevent New York workingmen from resenting by bloodshed a cowardly massacre of workingwomen by the militia.

Alexander Clarke had gone to the Far West, and is employed in the Cœur D'Alene mines, when the troubles occur which result in the regular army being sent to the scene. Andrew Craig, now a fine-looking man of middle age, goes to Craddocksboro on a visit to Herbert Prynne, who is in full charge of the coal mine there as superintendent, and falls in love with and marries Priscilla, daughter of Craddock, the owner of the mine, and he and his wife, a graduate of Vassar, and as talented as she is attractive, devote themselves to improving the relations between capital and labor.

The book is full of stirring incidents from start to finish; the tone is moral and religious, and it may be safely read in any family.

Adam Clarke: A Story of the Toilers:* Being a narrative of the experiences of a family of British emigrants to the United States, in cotton mill, iron foundry, coal mine, and other fields of labor. By Henry Mann, New York, Popular Book Company, 1904, $1.00.

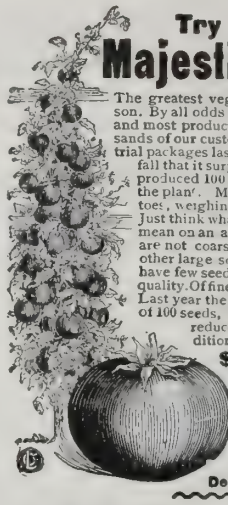
A Nation's Idol, by Charles Felton Pidgin, a romance of Franklin's nine years of happiness at the Court of France. A story full of romantic interest, and with a historical basis that adds greatly to its charm and value. Pp. 348, cloth covers. Price $1.50. Henry Altemus Co., Philadelphia, publishers.

Light on the Hills, edited by Charles Carroll Albertson, D.D. A compilation of the best things the great modern poets have written on Life and Death, Immortality, Heaven, the Resurrection, the Larger Hope, etc. Pp. 243; cloth, top gilt, with frontispiece. J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia and London, publishers.

First Principles of Agriculture, by Goff and Mayne, illustrated, tells the young student much that is practical and interesting about plants, soil, fruits, crops, seed and farming, and gardening generally. A text-book for agricultural schools. Pp. 248. American Book Company, New York, Cincinnati and Chicago, publishers.

Witchery Ways, by Amos R. Wells. For a modern teller of fairy tales, Mr. Wells has done remarkably clever work in this little volume of some sixteen stories, all of them excellent, and each with its wholesome lesson easily read between the lines. Of scores of "short story" books far more pretentious, there are few that possess merit equal to the modest book which will fascinate the "grown-ups" quite as much as it will charm the juveniles. Illustrated. Pp. 189; ornamental cloth binding. Price 50 cents. Henry Altemus Co., Philadelphia, publishers.



Try the New Majestic Tomato

The greatest vegetable novelty of the season. By all odds the largest, finest flavored and most productive in existence. Thousands of our customers who received small trial packages last spring wrote us in the fall that it surpassed all other sorts and produced 100 lbs. to 147 lbs. of fruit to the plant. Many reported single tomatoes, weighing 3 lbs. to 5¾ lbs. each. Just think what this kind of a crop would mean on an acre of ground. The fruits are not coarse grained and poor like other large sorts, but are smooth, solid, have few seeds, and are unsurpassed in quality. Of fine shape and beautiful color. Last year the seed sold at 40c per packet of 100 seeds, but this season, we have reduced price to 15cts, and in addition to this we are offering $100.00 in Cash prizes this year for the largest tomato grown.

Our large illustrated catalogue describing the above and many other choice novelties will be sent free if you mention this paper.

Young Women Evangelists

UNDER the General Assembly's Evangelistic Committee this year, there are two young women evangelists working in the State of Minnesota with great success. Miss Anna E. Smith is a graduate of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago. Since her training there, she has been constantly traveling in evangelistic work in the Northwest and Middle States, speaking over three hundred nights of every year.

MISS ANNA E. SMITH

MISS NELLIE READ

Some of the Western papers have reported that "Miss Smith breaks down a prejudice that exists in the minds of people where she goes, against woman's preaching." One of these papers recently said, "She is not a sensational revivalist or a skyrocket variety, but she preaches the Gospel with such plainness and such emphasis that no one can hear her and fail to realize that she is in earnest, and believes in the power of the Gospel to reach and lift men and women to better lives."

Two years ago, Miss Nellie Read, who is singing this year with Miss Smith, consecrated a cultivated voice to the work of soul-winning. Her success has proved her fitness for the work. Her songs never fail to reach the heart, because they come from the heart. The work of these young women extends into the towns and the cities, and pastors report it a success, both from the standpoint of souls being led to Christ, and of the large interest and attendance wherever they labor.

Where Three Christmases Come Together

IN some respects the American College for Girls at Constantinople is the strangest in the world. It has 140 to 160 students, about half of whom board in the college. Many of the borders are from such distant points as Mecca and Athens, Trebizond in the interior, Philippopolis and Sophia in Bulgaria, and Batoum and Tiflis in Russia, although a large proportion come from the Bosphorus villages, which really form part of Constantinople. Thus the school is made up of many different elements. Many of the girls are Armenians, most of whom belong to the Armenian Gregorian Church; a large number are Greeks of Orthodox faith; an equal number are Bulgarians, belonging to their branch of the Eastern Church; and a smaller number are "Franks," as Europeans are still called here; some French, some Germans, English, Hungarians and Americans. A few girls are Hebrews and a few Turks. Probably nowhere else could one find an institution made up of such diverse races and religions. The principles of religious instruction worked out here have, therefore, a high significance.

The variety of calendars followed by the people of Constantinople is never more confusing than during the holiday season, for even to a lover of fast days, two New Years, three Christmases and two "Bairams," coming closely together, are a good deal. As the Old Style calendar brings the twenty-fifth of December two weeks after the same day New Style, two Christmases (the first Latin and the second Greek) are inevitable. Stormy weather kept a delegation of Armenians from attending an Ecumenical Council at Chalcedon in 451, A. D., at which council the date of Christmas was changed from the 6th of January; hence the belated Gregorians keep their old day, and a third Christmas follows on the heels of the other two. The Christmas kept at the American College in Constantinople is the Western Christmas, for the winter holidays are so arranged as to let the Eastern girls go home for their days, when they live sufficiently near. On each of the holy days, a special dinner is served, and some sort of gaiety is offered the students who remain in college, but the great day is the Latin Christmas. This year the dinner for the "Frank" teachers and students was served on Saturday afternoon, and was as much like an American Christmas dinner as a fat turkey and bowls of cranberry jelly and mince pies could make it. Holly and red ribbons formed the table decoration. In the evening a merry party of the whole household was held in the gymnasium. At midnight, the quiet of the house was broken by the sweet strains of the hymn, "Holy Night, Peaceful Night," sung by a choir of girls in the corridors, heralding the holy day, Christmas is a time when the girls love to give pretty cards, and trifles made by themselves to the teachers, whose rooms become gay with holly and bright embroideries. On Sunday morning was held the Christmas service. A round of Christmas visits by the students on the teachers, completed a day full of sweetness and good will.

WHAT WILL YOU GIVE FOR HEALTH and A GOOD FIGURE?

WILL YOU GIVE ME 15 MINUTES IN YOUR HOME, AND GET WELL WITHOUT DRUGS?

—perfectly, completely well, with that glad joyous freedom and happiness in life and sweet personal loveliness which health and a well developed graceful body alone can give? There is nothing beautiful or attained or womanhood as lovely as a healthy, vigorous, well kept body, sound and sweet and wholesome, full of life and strength and life.

DRUGS ARE DANGEROUS

If the lungs, heart, nerves and every vital organ of the body are kept in uniform strength, there is no need of drugs or medicine. "A chain is no stronger than its weakest link." The permanent relief from weaknesses can only be in regaining the strength of weakened organs. In the recent National Convention of Druggists, it was shown that about 8,000 out of the 10,000 are handling adulterated drugs and probably fifty per cent. of the drugs contain morphine.

EVERY WOMAN CAN HAVE A CLEAR SKIN AND A GOOD FIGURE

Any woman by practicing fifteen minutes each day in her own room can have a good figure, clear skin, strong brain and the perfectly bodily poise which results from a sound condition of all the vital functions. We women do not want large muscles, but we want that vibrant life force born of a healthful spirit which makes life worth living. We also want flexible, symmetrical, well-rounded figures with that graceful dignified easy carriage which denotes character, culture and refinement.

I HAVE HELPED 15,000 WOMEN TO HELP THEMSELVES

My instructions by mail are strictly individual and strictly confidential. I direct the exercise, bathing and diet adapted to your condition, teach you how to breath, how to stand, how to walk. I strengthen the stomach and the nerves so that your food will nourish you, strengthen the liver, kidneys and intestines so that all impurities are thrown from the system; stimulate a sluggish circulation, send the blood bounding through your veins so that you feel warm and comfortable, put you in condition to resist colds; strengthen weak hearts and lungs, relieve you of weaknesses, lame backs and headaches. When this is done, you will have a clear brain and a vibrant life force. If your vital organs and muscles are packed about by too much fat, I reduce you to normal proportions. If you are thin, I put the vital organs and the nerves in condition so that you will assimilate your food.

I wish you could read the mail on my desk for one day—it would make you happy as it does me. I am quoting to you below extracts from some letters from my pupils. Some of these names I have permission to give,—others I have not, but I can duplicate any one of these extracts many times a day.

"The lump on my side which the doctor called a tumor has entirely disappeared and I am so happy, Miss Cocroft."
"I have not had a sign of gall stones since I began your work."
"I weigh 84 pounds less, and have gained wonderfully in strength."
"My kidneys are much better."
"My stomach does not trouble me at all now; I can eat anything."
"Just think of it! To be relieved from constipation! Entirely free after having it for thirty years!"
"The rheumatism has disappeared and I sleep such a restful sleep."
"I have grown from a nervous wreck into a state of good quiet nerves."
"My eyes are strong and I have taken off my glasses."
"My weight has increased 30 pounds."
"My bust has increased 4 inches in the past three months."
"I am delighted with the effect of the exercises upon my catarrh."

MY BOOKLET AND ADVICE ARE FREE

I take but a limited number of pupils, because I give each pupil my personal attention. I do not work with a woman unless I am sure that I can help her. I know I can Reduce Prominent Abdomens and Hips, build up Thin Necks and Chests and bring any woman to roundness and symmetry. I have done all of these hundreds of times. It is no longer an experiment with me. WRITE TO ME, telling me your particular difficulties, and I will send you letters from my pupils and give you the names of women who have been relieved of above difficulties. I will send you an instructive booklet on how to stand correctly. Every woman should know this if she would be perfectly well. I charge you nothing for this booklet and nothing for my information in regard to your case.

THE CHRISTIAN AT HOME*

HOW the Christian behaves in his home is a truer test of the sincerity and power of his profession, than his conduct in public. A shrewd observer said that he "would not give a button for the Christianity of any man, whose horse and dog were not better off for his being a Christian." Religion ought to lay its grip on the whole man and affect him in every relation. The Christian home should be better than any other home. The home that has but one Christian in it, ought to be under a better influence because of his presence. All the graces of the Christian character have opportunity to flourish in the home. Love, gentleness, patience, forbearance, charity, helpfulness are all needed there, and all have their share in making home happy. Husband and wife, parents and children, employers and servants are saved from friction in their respective relations when the Christian graces are displayed on both sides.

It was never intended that religion should exhaust itself in mere doctrine and theory. Doctrine is necessary, because conduct is based upon it; but doctrine that does not become the spring of conduct is barren and useless. Children may be prejudiced for life against religion if their Christian parents are captious and given to fault-finding. Servants are liable to form a low estimate of Christianity if their Christian mistress is impatient, fretful and capricious. Even the employer is influenced for evil if the Christian servant is lazy and untidy. Every follower of Christ has the honor of his Saviour in his keeping in the home, no matter what his position. Not only for his own sake; not only for the sake of his own character, but for the sake of Christ, he ought to do his whole duty cheerfully and with a willing heart. Those around him should be able to see in his life what Christianity really is, and should be attracted to it by his conduct. In this way God is glorified by our lives. That is, he is honored and his power is recognized, because those about us realize that the virtues we exhibit are not a natural growth, but must have had a supernatural origin.

The story has been told so often as to need mere mention here, of the servant who, when asked what evidence she had of being a Christian, replied, that now she "swept under the mats." She had entered the service of one whom it was a joy to serve thoroughly.

A girl who was away at a boarding-school was converted, and when about to return home afterwards on vacation, was troubled about her behavior to her mother. Formerly she had been undutiful and disobedient, and she feared that she could not live as a Christian girl should. Her mother was one of those fretful, discontented, complaining women whom no one could please. Her fault-finding distressed all about her, and though people made excuse for her that she was nervous, it was hard to be patient with her. The girl went to her teacher, who had been the means of leading her to Christ, and told her the difficulty. "It is no new thing" said the teacher, "and the Apostle Peter gives you the remedy. Follow his advice: 'For what glory is it, if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye take it patiently? But, if when ye do well and suffer for it ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God.'" "Acceptable with God," said the girl, "that is enough for me." She went home with her mind set on the passage, and the mother after a few days, saw the change in her daughter, and being told the reason, sought the same remedy for her own wicked conduct.

Sam Jones relates that one morning his wife complained of their servant, who, she said, was so negligent and careless that she could bear with her no longer. "They are sad faults," he said, "that would justify any one in getting rid of a servant. I am guilty of them only too often. I am glad that my Divine Master is so patient with me that he has kept me in his service to this day." This was a new view of the trouble to his wife and the servant kept her situation. Perhaps all servants would have more considerate masters and mistresses, if the latter remembered that they too are in service and need their Master's forbearance.

Deaf People Now Hear Whispers

Listening Machines Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but Act Like Eye-Glasses.

Ever see a pair of Listening Machines?
They make the Deaf hear distinctly.
They are so soft in the ears one can't tell they are wearing them.
And, no one else can tell either, because they are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums are to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sight.
Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just as glasses are sight-magnifiers.
They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain off them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. They can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minute, just as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and off.
And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, because they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.

These little telephones make it as easy for a Deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing grows, because they rest up, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.
Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people can talk with their friends without the friends having to shout back at them. They can hear without straining. It is the straining that puts such a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person.

* * * *

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound strike hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of spreading it weakly all over the surface. It thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struck the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ear drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves. When we make the drum vibrate ten times as much we make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.
This is why people who had not in years heard a clock strike can now hear that same clock tick anywhere in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ear Drums.
Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noises in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and cured (even after Ear Doctors have given up the cases), by the use of these comfortable little ear-resters and sound-magnifiers.
A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.
Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks who were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book. They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.
Some of these very people may live near you, and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.
This book has been the means of making 326,000 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it today. Don't put off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.
Write for it today to the Wilson Ear Drum Co. 2098 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

Christ's Healing

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THERE was in Jerusalem a famous pool, which had a repute for healing virtue; not always, but at a certain season, when, it was asserted, an angel went down and "troubled the waters, whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in, was made whole of whatsoever disease he had." On this slender hope so many rested their expectation of healing, that the five porches of the pool were filled with "a great multitude of impotent folk: of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water."

The Lord Jesus came as the Brightness of his Father's glory, the express image of his Person. What could the human Image of "Jehovah that healeth thee" do but heal, where he came in contact with sickness? But how should he act? Should he proclaim himself? No! His Father had proclaimed him from heaven at his baptism; John the Baptist had proclaimed him; the Scriptures had proclaimed him; and now his works were proclaiming him. But in spite of all this combined witness, it was true of the Jewish people as a whole: "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life" (ver. 40). The Lord Jesus was not unknown in Jerusalem; many who had seen him at the Passover only a short time before had "believed on him, seeing the miracles which he had done;" how was it, then, that none of these needy ones came to him for help? It was the old story: "Ye will not." He might heal them; they knew he could; but then the cost! Could they afford the probable loss of prestige? of many things which the world had to give of patronage and preferment, of society? No; they would not.

The heart of man is at enmity against God. These miserable beings would rather take the chance of continuing lost in their misery and sickness than be healed by Jesus, and become his followers. The world is full of misery, and truly there standeth One among them, who is full of help, but they will not come unto Him that they may be saved. They might be, but they will not come directly to Him. Human help is preferred, because it entails no responsibility on the sore question of sin. "Whosoever will, let him come, and take of the water of life freely" (Rev. 22: 17), is God's proclamation, but over the majority the sad indictment has to be written: "Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life." Some say: "There are so many who tell us, that this and that and the other passage in the Bible is not inspired. How are we to know what is the truth?" Here is the answer from headquarters, from the Lord himself: "He that willeth to do his will shall know of the doctrine" (John 7: 17, R. V.). If the will is on God's side, he is pledged to enlighten the understanding, but the most will not come.

Jesus did not leave this crowd of needy ones without witness of his power and readiness to heal. There was one man who was perhaps the most hopeless among them. For thirty-eight years he had been helpless, and day by day he had been carried to the pool, in the hope that some day he might happen to be put into the water first after it had been troubled; this hope, perhaps, kept him alive. Jesus saw him lie, and his great heart of compassion went out to the poor hopeless man. He knew that the impotent man "had been long in that case;" and he put to him the question, which he is putting to-day to each of us: "Wilt thou be made whole?" The poor man, having no conception of healing beyond the pool, which was his world, said: "Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool; but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me." It did indeed seem hopeless; and yet he hoped on, but his hopes were always from the pool: he saw nothing beyond.

How are human beings to be got out of the narrowness of their conceptions? What is there that has power to work a change in the heart? Something which God has given us, but which very few prize to its full value. It is his Word. Jesus is the living Word: and his life power is in the written Word. He said to the impotent man, "Rise, take up thy bed, and walk." And there was life-power with the word. "Immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked."

THE "THRONE OF THE INCAS," NEAR THE FORTRESS

"MISHTI," THE GREAT VOLCANO NEAR CUZCO

ANCIENT INCA FORTRESS NEAR CUZCO

An Experiment in Industrial Missions

WITHIN a very recent date, there has come into existence the Foreign Missions Industrial Association, a new missionary society which is the outgrowth of missionary operations in many parts of the globe. It has the same object as the various denominational and interdenominational missionary societies, viz: to evangelize the world by carrying the Gospel of Jesus Christ to men and women in other lands, who do not yet know of Christ.

Up to the present time, the industrial method has, for the most part, been a department of the educational work, that is to say, where missionaries have established schools, in many cases they have combined with the regular studies industrial education, which has been remarkably successful. With the work that is now being carried on by the existing missionary societies along all lines, including industrial education, this new association does not seek to interfere. It will rather supplement and extend what is already being done, by the development of new fields for missionary effort. The general plan will be more easily understood if the conditions are explained under which this new society operates.

In July, 1895, three missionaries went to Cuzco, the old Inca capital of Peru, to preach the Gospel. After seven weeks of great persecution, they were illegally expelled from the city. In 1896, an apology having been offered by the Peruvian Government, they returned, and started schools. These were opposed vigorously, however, by the Catholic Church, and after they had been opened about seven months the missionaries were again compelled to leave Cuzco, and the schools were closed by order of the authorities. Undiscouraged, the missionaries resolved to return, and to commence operations in a different way, namely, to go as business men, and to carry on industrial work. A store was rented, a photographic studio was built, and in a few months the work was made successful. From this beginning it has developed, until now there is a book store, a flour mill, a bakery, a machine shop, and since 1902 the profits from this work have been sufficient to support the missionaries and their work without contributions from home. In all, about forty men are employed, many friends have been made, and prejudice has been broken down. Up to the present time, forty-five natives have been baptized. The first Christian Church in the interior of Peru meets in a room over the store, and is a strong, aggressive, zealous body of believers. Of these converts, two are Indians, descendants of the Incas, two are natives from the forest regions of the Amazon, who formerly knew nothing about God or Christ, and one is a Dominican friar, who formerly knew nothing of salvation through faith. He will probably become the pastor of the first Peruvian Church iu Cuzco.

This example will serve to show that industrial work may be the best method for the entrance of the Gospel in countries that are well-nigh inaccessible to the regular missionary.

Around Cuzco the country is exceedingly picturesque, and dotted with those massive ruins for which Peru is famous. In the neighborhood are those of the Temple of the Sun, which is said to have been the most magnificent building in Peru. The masons of the ancient Incas had a method of construction that has proved almost indestructible. Enormous blocks of sandstone were used for the walls, each being so cut and fitted without cement, that at the present time, in many cases, one cannot insert a penknife in the joints. Where especial strength was required, metal clamps were used, resembling somewhat those used in ancient Greek temples. It is impossible to determine how the stones were put in place, as they often weigh several tons. About the largest are found in the fortress of the Incas at Cuzco.

Some idea of the mathematical accuracy of the Peruvian architects can be obtained from one of the accompanying photographs, showing the traditional staircase of the Incas throne. The men in the picture are two American missionaries. The principal Inca god was the sun. On the island of Coacti is a temple that was used by the virgins of the sun. It is in almost perfect condition, and over a hundred and eighty feet long. It was two stories high and contained thirty-five rooms. Near by are the ruins of many buildings, to which the explorers have been unable to give any distinct name.

THE "OPEN BIBLE" IN PERU

A Missionary explaining the Gospel to a priest, who afterward became a teacher of the Truth

In other lands, too, the Industrial Mission principle has already been put into successful operation. There is an old-established German Mission, which has its headquarters in Basle, Switzerland, which has for many years carried on a most successful work in Africa and in South India, on the lines indicated. There is also an English Society which has been in successful operation for about eight years, but up to the present time there has been no American Industrial Mission working on the lines on which the Foreign Missions Industrial Association is working. The first company to be formed will be the one in Cuzco, in Peru. An additional $10,000 will be needed to increase the stock and enlarge the work, and when it is subscribed, the Company will be organized under the laws of New York State with a capital of $25,000, $15,000 of which has already been subscribed. This industry established, it is proposed to start a similar one for the making of repousse work in brass and silver in Ahmednagar, India.

. It is generally conceded, by missionaries that the problem of self-support is an urgent and growing one in mission work. It applies to the converts as well; better to give them a means of livelihood than to leave them as paupers; yet this is what must happen in a great many cases in India, unless industrial work is established there. In India, and in many other lands, when a man becomes a Christian, his social condition is changed and his needs are increased. He must have clothing, better living quarters, and food which costs more. In India and in Mohammedan lands, the moment a man becomes a Christian he is put out of his caste and he becomes dependent upon the Mission for support. If he has the ability and the spiritual desire, he may become a native pastor and be supported by the churches; but converts are now far too numerous for all to be made effective Gospel workers and to be supported in this way. The missionaries feel greatly the need of trained native artisans who are Christians, and this result can be attained through the work of the Foreign Missions Industrial Association.

The missionaries themselves cannot conduct the business operations that are designed to furnish employment to the converts; they are too busy with the evangelistic, educational, medical, literary, and other forms of mission work. Even if they had the time, they are not the best fitted to carry on industrial and commercial operations, as their training has been altogether along

The PLEADING RIVER

TEXT—ISAIAH 48: 18

"Then had thy peace been as a river"

WHAT art thou doing, O prophet of Israel? Art thou taunting thy people with the blessing they had missed through forsaking God and disregarding thy teaching? When trouble swoops, art thou one of those who say, "I told you so? If you had only taken my advice, you would not be in the difficulty you are in to-day. If you will make your bed out of thorns and thistles, instead of rose-leaves, then upon the thorns and thistles you must lie." Are you like an executioner who upbraids and derides the trembling murderer, whose life he is soon to strangle with the rope? In drawing your enchanting picture of peace flowing like a river, before a people harassed by powerful foreign enemies, and disturbed by internal dissensions, are you not merely adding to their distress, as the mirage of the desert aggravates the thirst of the dying traveler? Are you saying to your miserable people, "Look at those beautiful banks watered by the river, rich in flora, and tuneful with singing birds; they would have been all yours if you had not wandered into the Desert of Sin; but now they are lost to you forever?"

"Ah no," says the prophet Isaiah, "it is not to aggravate their thirst that I tell them of this river, but to invite them to return to the way from which they have wandered; not to exult over their misfortunes, but to warn them of the consequences of sin. I am not here glorying in the suffering of God's fallen ones. My river is not composed of the black waters of the River Styx, but from the flowing crystal waters of the 'River of Life.' I am like a loving father whose wayward son has disregarded warnings, and has sinned and brought himself into trouble, and the father sorrows with him and pleads with him to repent, and assures him that if he will forsake his sin, his wickedness shall be forgiven, and his peace shall be like a river as though he had never sinned." May God help us, as we use the banks of the Jordan or the Rhine, or the Tiber, or the upper Thames, or the banks of our own poetic Hudson for a sacred pulpit. Such a river bank to-day may become as sacred a pulpit as that in the chancel of Westminster Abbey, or St. Paul's or Canterbury Cathedral, even though bishop's hand has not consecrated it, or ecclesiastical convocation dedicated it.

A Natural Law

The Pleading River, in the first place, teaches us that the divine peace which comes to man must come as the result of natural law in the spiritual life. It is not the result of haphazard. It is not a miracle, as we in the broad sense term a miracle. It does not come as a miraculous wind which might dig up a seed in some Italian garden and in its teeth lift it above Alpine crag and carry it over land and sea, and without human aid plant it as an exotic upon the banks of the Ohio, or the Monongahela rivers. But the divine peace comes to man as the result of a rational cause. It has a rational source, as a river has a natural source. It has a natural flow, as the Jordan has a natural flow. And it has a rational outlet, as the Amazon empties itself into the Atlantic, or the Ganges finds a resting place in the huge reservoir of the Bengal Gulf.

A river cannot disobey natural law. A river cannot become a free lance among rivers. A river cannot do anything that specific gravity says, "Thou shalt not do." This fact is demonstrated everywhere. I climb one of the tall pyramids of the Rocky Mountains. There, upon the highest peak, I find what is called a water-shed. Then as I stand upon this water-shed, I repeat to myself the beautiful words of the poet:

> God sent his messenger, the rain,
> And said unto the mountain brook,
> "Rise up and from thy caverns look
> And leap with naked, snow-white feet,
> From the cool hills into the heart
> Of the broad arid plain."

But though the mountain brooks may leap from the cool hills into the heat of the broad, arid plain, it makes a great deal of difference into what plain that falling raindrop shall go, whether it falls one inch to the right, or one inch to the left of the Rocky Mountain water-shed. One inch to the right, it flows into the Gulf of Mexico; one to the left, it flows into the waters of the Pacific. The waters of a river must obey natural law. Now if God's laws are inexorable in regulating the source and the course of a river, are they not equally inexorable in reference to the source and the course of his divine peace, which is like a river?

You must obey God's laws before you can enjoy God's peace. To resist them, to disobey him, is to set yourself against omnipotent power and infinite wisdom. It is not necessary that God should punish you for it, you bring the punishment on yourself, in failure and disappointment and eternal wreck. Your whole nature is given over to anarchy and lawlessness. Only as you yield to his will, do you put yourself in line with the eternal order and enter into peace. I do not care how much you may think your way is better than God's ways, one fact you must understand: you cannot get the divine peace, which is like a river, unless you bring yourself into harmony with God's laws and obey God's commandments.

God's Way

Naaman had to learn this lesson before he could be cured of his leprosy. His way was that the prophet should come out to him, and stand and call on the name of the Lord and strike his hand over the place. God's way was that he dip seven times in the Jordan. When he took God's way he was cured, but not until he took it. God's way can cure you, O immortal, of your sin. Are you ready to welcome this divine peace, like a river, which will come to you through Jesus Christ? The way of the Cross is the source of this peace. From the Mount of Calvary that stream gushes forth, as from Mount Hermon flows the Jordan, and from the Adirondacks the mighty Hudson.

But the Pleading River teaches us another lesson about the divine peace which passeth all understanding. The longer a disciple of Jesus Christ lives a Christian life, the deeper and wider does the river of his peace become. It should deepen and widen, and grow more majestic in volume, even as the waters of the Hudson grow deeper and wider as they slip past the Highlands and lap the feet of the Palisades, and sweep on in their grandeur to the place where they are married to the waters of the mighty deep, at the nuptial altar of Governor's Island in Long Island Sound. It should go on growing deeper and wider, even as become the waters of the River Orinoco, where they empty themselves into the unfathomable depths of the sea. When in 1498, Christopher Columbus for the first time touched the mainland of South America, and saw this great river, one of his officers congratulated him, because he had discovered another island. The immortal explorer replied, "No such river as that flows from an island. That mighty torrent drains the waters of a continent." The Pleading River of God's peace grows wider and deeper as we travel along its banks in the journey of life. At the beginning of our Christian course, it may seem a small stream; but as the years pass and our feet come nearer and nearer to the great ocean of Eternity, the volume of the river increases until it becomes a peace that passeth understanding.

The Widening River

Is this increasing power, true in reference to our spiritual peace. As you compare your present life with that of your spiritual life ten, twenty, thirty years ago, are you conscious that you love God more now than you did then? Do you read the Bible more now than you did when you joined the Church and prepared for your first communion? Is your enjoyment of prayer and your dependence upon it, more intense now than it was at first? Are you striving more earnestly than formerly, to gather the showers of blessing that are everywhere falling around you, into your own spiritual nature? Are you more ready now than at the beginning of your Christian career to go into the house of a neighbor on whom sickness or bereavement has fallen, to administer comfort, and to cheer him with reminders of God's promises? There is something awfully wrong with a Christian who, while his wealth and mental power increase with the passing years, finds that his spiritual nature does not widen and deepen like the Pleading River of God's peace.

Indeed, I sometimes think that our so-called peace is not like a river at all. It is more like a brackish, stagnant pool, or as a dried-up well that gives forth no water. "There was a very good well here once," said an old farmer, in reference to a certain drinking trough. "Indeed," answered a preacher on his vacation, "is that so? I wonder what is the matter with it. How did it get filled up?" "Neglect, sir," answered the farmer. "First a little rubbish got in it. Then a little more, and a little more, and a little more. The dirt and refuse were not cleared out, and the water grew worse and worse, and less and less, until at last the well became choked up. I wonder if there is any water at the bottom of this well?" "Yes," said the preacher, "I wonder if there is any water at the bottom of the well?" Is that like our peace? Is it a well and not a river?

As the Mississippi River is fed by the Missouri, the Ohio, the Tennessee, and the Red rivers, and indirectly by the Allegheny, the Monongahela, the Yellowstone, and the Platte, so from many sources might the river of our peace receive the waters of blessing; but instead we allow the dirt and refuse of this world to choke the passages by which they might enter, and our river dwindles into a stagnant pool. Have we become dried up spiritual wells? As the tourists dropping pebbles into Jacob's well have choked it up, some of us have choked up our Gospel wells. Years ago we dropped the pebble of Sabbath desecration into it. Years ago in went another pebble—absence from Sunday School and church worship. Years ago we took to reading the Sunday newspapers instead of the Bible. No wonder that our peace, which should pass all understanding, and be like a river, widening and deepening each year, is like a brackish, stagnant pool, or dried up like Jacob's well. If it be not like a river, the fault is ours and not God's. God is pouring down upon us everywhere his showers of spiritual blessing, which we should gather, freshet-like, into the river-beds of our hearts.

Active Beneficence

But the Pleading River not only teaches our relationship to God, but also our practical spiritual relationship to our fellow-men. It clearly and emphatically and distinctly says: "Gospel peace must be eyes to the blind, food for the hungry, clothing for the naked, and happy firesides for the homeless." It teaches man that the first great commandment is to love the Lord our God with all our soul and strength and mind. And the second is like unto it; we must love our neighbors as ourselves. It is a law of our nature, that peace and happiness come to us through service to others. No man is so happy as he who has made another happy. No pillow is so restful as that of him who has relieved the anxiety of his brother. The peace that passeth understanding never fills the heart that cherishes selfish desires or turns away from another's misery.

How is it with America? "I would like to see America; but the people are not as great as you think," said Thomas Carlyle to an American visitor. "You may boast of your democracy, or any other 'cracy,' or any other kind of political rubbish, but the reason why your laboring folks are so happy, is that you have a vast deal of land for a very few people." True, Thomas Carlyle, true. But what would our lands be worth if we did not have our mighty rivers to water them? Whence could our cattle find water to drink and grass to eat, but for the rivers? How could our grain lift its golden cheek to be kissed of the sun, unless its roots once waded knee deep in the mud? What makes the Atlantic coast, especially New England, have the most fertile valleys? The rivers. What makes the Sanara one great sea of sand?

The Absence of the Rivers

Yes, as the Egyptians for centuries, worshiped the River Nile because its rise or fall meant to them food or famine, clothing or nakedness, prosperity or poverty, health or disease, the rivers of our land are the source of fertility to the soil and prosperity to our people. If the peace of our hearts is to be like a river, it must give help temporal and spiritual to all around us.

Are we temporal and spiritual "rivers of life" to our fellow-men? Some of us are truly "rivers of death" or "rivers of seclusion." Our lives are like the stygian stream in the great Mammoth Cave of Kentucky. We are surrounded by grandeurs and beauties on every side; but we have walled ourselves in by solid rock, where we can do no good to others, and where others cannot do any good to us.

Or, our lives, if they are not like the Styx of a ammoth Cave, supporting only a few blind fish swimng hundreds of feet below the surface of the earth, ay be like the wonderfully suggestive beauties of a uray Cave of Old Virginia, which likewise are doing good to any one. That Luray Cave is a marvelous ace. Though its beauties were buried for centuries, t under the flash of light, it looks as though its walls d been erected only yesterday, and like the Taj Mahal India, are a glittering mass of dead precious stones. onder stand the columns of stalagmite as statuary in stal garments of purest white. Here are the drippings a cataract, as though the mad rush of a Niagara had en instantly halted, and, like an open-mouthed lion, dred not utter one growl, although even now we seem hear the echo of its last wild mad roar. Yonder is e "ball-room," where our imagination tells us the mphs and the fairies used to sport and dance and make erry. Near to this "Ball Hall" is the "Cemetery dge," where those nymphs and fairies were buried es on ages ago. Here are the "Hanging Veils of the oddesses," so thin that through them flashes the light of r guides' lamps. From yonder cathedral, with its domes d spires and steeples and minarets and strange rvings, there come echoing up the solemn notes of organ, which roll and swell and thunder and isper and pray and chant and die. From out of ery grotto stretches some hand or lifts some snowank or flaps some wing, or, like a cat's eye, blinks some nerald, or, tiger like, glares the bloodshot eye-ball of me ruby or flashes some emerald. And while all the chimes of all the towers are beginning to ring, suddenly a stalactite, many tons in weight, breaks loose and crashes upon the floor. It shivers, rolls over once or twice, and then lies still, to be decomposed by the coming ages. A marvelous and enchanting place is Luray Cave of Old Virginia.

All its walls are strangely sculptured,
Column high and chasm wide,
'Tis the place where all the shadows,
Of the past years silent hide.

But when I stood within the walls of that fascinating place, I said to myself: How like selfish man is this cave. His heart is a heart of stone. Amid the sufferings and troubles of a sinful world, with all his vast resources for doing good, he buries himself in a walled citadel, which is called his home, or his store. He lives, he breathes, he eats, he sleeps, he works for himself, and himself alone. Oh, my brother, may your Gospel peace be not like the glittering grandeur hidden in the darkness of a Luray Cave in Virginia, or of a silent "River Styx," flowing through the dark halls of a Mammoth Cave of Old Kentucky. May it be a "River of Life," bringing peace and joy and hope to all who are willing to bend down their parched and sinful lips to lap of the spiritual waters.

But I cannot close this sermon upon this beautiful text, without finding one more symbol. The Pleading River is not only a "River of Consecration" to God, but a "River of Triumph." It is not only the crystal gates through which, as the "Jordan of Death," we shall enter the tomb, but it is the crystal gates by which we shall leave the "Wilderness of Trouble and Earthly Wanderings," and enter into the "Promised Land of Heaven and Eternal Joy." Shall our peace, which is like a river, stop at the brink of the grave? We have read how George Frederick Handel, on the River Thames, won his great musical victory over the irate George I, of England. When King George was Elector of Hanover, he befriended the young unknown musician Handel, and made him court musician. But after Handel had won musical fame, he tired of the Hanover Court and hied himself to London. This greatly enraged the Elector. When he became King of England as George I, he would have nothing to do with his old favorite. But, one day, the king gave a great fete upon the River Thames. As the royal barge moved along, another barge followed, playing twenty-five concertos of music. These concertos, gathered together under one musical head, are known as the celebrated "Water Music" of Handel. Every musical instrument then known was utilized in the orchestra. "Ah!" said King George, "no one could compose such music as that but my old court musician, Frederick Handel!" At once the king restored Handel to favor and gave to him a salary of $1,000 per year. But though Handel, upon the River Thames, was able to play himself into the good graces of an earthly king, our divine peace, like a river, shall yet open for us a more triumphant entry into the royal courts of heaven. There we shall not have to play as Handel played, but we shall have all the celestial choir, which sang for the shepherds above the Judean hills, sing for us a divine welcome.

An Experiment in Industrial Missions

her lines. Besides, to make ch a line of work successful, ould require the undivided atntion of men of ripe experice. The Industrial Associaon proposes to send out laymen carry on these industrial enerprises—men who, first of all, ave the Christian spirit, who re willing to go, as business en, to advance the cause of hrist in other lands, and who re competent to manage inustrial enterprises successfully.

Such a society will help solve e problem of self-support for onverts on the foreign field, hich is one of the most complex roblems in missionary work toay. Not only will it have no eed of appealing for gifts, but t will be actually putting money nto the missionary work, money hich has been earned and not iven. Eventually, it is not mpossible that it may contribte materially to the various ocieties to help carry on their ndustrial work.

GROUP OF WOOD WORKERS AT THE INDUSTRIAL MISSION, CUZCO

One of the greatest hindrances to the success of the nissionary in Eastern lands to-day is the bad example of many business men from the West, who live in the East, and as the saying is, "leave their morals at Port Said." The natives observe their godless lives, and hearing of them as Christians, they are prejudiced against a religion that has such representatives. If, instead of these men, there should be in the future a larger proportion of consecrated business men, filled with the missionary spirit, and working harmoniously with and for the missionaries, one of the very greatest obstacles to the spread of the Gospel in non-Christian lands will have been removed.

This new society proposes to establish industrial centres wherever they may be needed, and where they will prove helpful to missionary operations. The business interest of Christian men and women will be enlisted, but all returns over six per cent. will be used by the Association in establishing new industrial enterprises and extending the work, always in connection with and as an adjunct to missions. The entire scheme is subsidiary to the missionary work which it is designed to supplement and strengthen.

To those who may imagine that it is impracticable, the answer is that it has already been done and done successfully by the Christians of other lands, and if so, why not by the missionary-loving people of America? Now, what is to bring about the realization of these hopes? When the war loans of Japan and Russia are offered by brokers for sale, the bonds are oversubscribed in the first forenoon. Shall Christians be less ready to come forward and furnish the money to carry on the war that is being waged against the Spirit of Darkness by the pioneers of Gospel Light in heathen lands? F. M. Gilbert.

Taylor University Experiences a Revival

A REVIVAL at Taylor University is no new or strange occurrence. No year has ever passed in the history of the institution without such manifestations of the Divine power.

During the fall term last year, there were indications of spiritual decline, which shot pangs of regret through many hearts, and sent many to their knees with the cry, "O Lord, why hast thou turned thy face away from us?" As a consequence of much heart searching, the term closed with very evident indications that the tide which had been ebbing, had begun to come back. The last Sunday, December 18, was a great day. Several souls were converted in the student meetings held that night, in different rooms.

The winter term opened Jan. 4. Sunday afternoon, the 8th, the president preached upon the "Baptism of the Holy Ghost." The congregation was deeply moved. There was no meeting that night or the next. But Tuesday morning, at chapel worship, the president told the assembled teachers and students that he was impressed that it was the divine will that special services should be held, beginning that night. The students were asked to stand, if they were of the same mind. All came to their feet, or nearly all. The campaign began that night, and continued till Sunday night, Jan. 22. The first night, Prof. Hudnutt preached. Next night, the exercises were prayer and testimony, with the president leading. Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday nights there was preaching by students. Monday, three young men, evangelists from Texas, came to visit the school, intending to depart the next day. They were invited to conduct the meeting that night, and the divine blessing so rested upon their labors that they were easily persuaded to stay a week.

It is difficult to describe this revival. The spirit of conviction was on the unsaved students in a marvelous degree. Some actually ran to the altar. All school exercises had to be discontinued for a week. One morning, the faculty thought it best to have the usual recitations; but, at chapel worship, several sinners came uninvited to the front of the platform and dropped on their knees, imploring Divine mercy. That settled the question, "Shall we have recitations?" That week nothing could be done but pray and sing and exhort and point sinners to Christ, and praise God for his wonderful work, with brief intervals for eating and sleeping. One evening the preacher could not preach because sinners began coming to the altar almost as soon as the meeting opened. The work of conviction and conversion was most deep and thorough. That the work is real, is evidenced by the fact that some of the students confessed breaches of law known only to themselves, and made financial restitution. Many who were already members of the family of God received the baptism of the Holy Ghost and testify with shining faces that the "blood of Jesus Christ c'eanseth from all sin." The University campus seems like a section of heaven, like a suburban park of the New Jerusalem.

It is an old-fashion revival. It contradicts the oft-repeated falsehood that the days of revivals are passed. If the spirit which prevails at Taylor University were spread over all the land, the whole continent would soon be wrapt in one sheet of celestial fire. Taylor University is sending out a little army of sanctified preachers, missionaries, and lay workers who, under God, will repeat this revival in half the States of this Republic. The Texas evangelists, to whom under God we owe so much, are the Roberts brothers and Mr. Allie Irick.

CROWDS GOING TO THE NOON-DAY MEETING AT THE OPERA HOUSE

THE GREAT REVIVAL MEETING IN THE PEOPLE'S TABERNACLE

The Wonderful Revival in Denver

Thousands Confess Christ and the Western City has a Great Awakening

BY H. E. DUPUY

FOR three weeks, lacking one day, Denver has been passing through a remarkable religious experience. The city has been stirred as never before in its history; thousands of Christians have been brought nearer to Christ, and a great multitude of those who were away from him have acknowledged him for the first time as a Saviour.

The meetings were first considered about a year ago, and six months later, an invitation, which practically included all of the churches in Denver, was sent to Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman. He in turn was asked to bring with him nine other evangelists in whose ability he had confidence. The complete corps of evangelists is as follows:

J. Wilbur Chapman	W. E. Biederwolf	Henry Ostrom
Clarence B. Strause	W. H. Stough	John H. Elliott
Daniel S. Toy	Samuel Callen	C. T. Schaeffer
C. B. Allen	A. C. Peck, with singers

Meetings began January 4, and from the very first, clearest indications were given that this was God's set time to favor his people in Denver. The harvest seemed ready at once for the reaping, churches were thronged, noon meetings were held in the largest churches; then they were moved to the largest theatre in the city. The buildings from the very first were overcrowded.

Two or three remarkable features should be mentioned in connection with the work. The Midnight Meeting was held in what is known as the "Red Light District." From all over the city, a picked number of Christian workers assembled at the First Baptist Church at 10 o'clock P. M. After the hour of prayer, a procession of Christians, stretching out over three blocks, moved through that portion of Denver which is given up to vice, stopping to sing before the saloons and waiting for a little while on Market Street. This street is almost wholly given up to wickedness. While the procession halted, earnest Christian workers from the Salvation Army and the Volunteers entered the different saloons and houses, giving invitations to the inmates to come at once to Curtis' Theatre, where the meeting was to be held. When we reached the theatre at half-past 11 o'clock, fully six hundred men and women of all classes and conditions were in line. The theatre was filled, and after the addresses by Rev. Henry Ostrom and Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, more than one hundred men and women pressed to the front to accept Christ. In the procession of Christians who aided in this work there were some of the most prominent people in the city. The Rev. Robert F. Coyle, D.D., former Moderator of the General Assembly, with some of his church officers, and with all the leading pastors of the city, bankers, lawyers, merchants, and even some of the refined women of Denver, went forth to let the lost people know that they cared for their souls.

Friday, January 20, was observed as the Day of Prayer. At 10 o'clock each pastor met his own people, and the churches were filled. The service continued an hour. At 11.30 the stores of the city closed their doors, that their clerks might attend the services, and all business ceased until 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The Mayor, the Hon. Robert Speer, sent out a proclamation that all business cease; the State Legislature adjourned, and both the Governor and Mayor attended the Noon-day Meeting, occupying seats on the platform. Four theatres were filled at 12 o'clock, and one of the largest churches in the city was crowded. It was estimated that twelve thousand people attended the services at this hour, and the police department state that ten thousand people stood outside the doors clamoring for admission.

Saturday night, January 21, another unique service was held in the People's Tabernacle, of which Rev. Mr. Uzzell is the successful pastor. He has erected in that part of the city where temptation is the strongest, a beautiful church, and has gathered about him great hosts of earnest men and women, some of them saved from great sin and temptation; others drawn to him because of his own tenderness and zeal. On Saturday night at 7 o'clock, a great company of men gathered at the Y. M. C. A., and they then proceeded to visit the saloons, extending an invitation to men to attend the service, for men only, in the Tabernacle. The building was crowded to the doors. From 7 to 8 o'clock, "Parson Uzzell," as he is familiarly called, fed the hungry. Fifteen thousand sandwiches and forty gallons of coffee were consumed. Rev. Daniel S. Toy told the story of his life, and when the invitation was given, another remarkabl scene was witnessed. Scores of men hurried to th front of the church that they might proclaim their alle giance to Christ.

DR. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN AND HIS CORPS OF EVANGELISTS

The meetings closed January 23, and the evangelisti party proceeded to California. From there they go t Oregon and Washington.

Notes of the Denver Meetings

Dr. Clarence B. Strause, of Virginia, was the evan gelist in charge of the first district. The committee i charge report over seven hundred and fifty as confess ing Christ. About five hundred have applied for mem bership in the different churches.

This closing service was a most marvelous one. Whe the invitation was given to all who would forsake si forever and take Christ, men and women fairly flocke to the front. All the space at the front was filled an the aisles absolutely crowded halfway to the doors. Tw of the pastors on the platform esti mated that there were over two hun dred and fifty. Tears of joy ra down the faces of the pastors. Dr Harris expressed the sentiment of al when he said, "I have never behel such a scene in my life." Nearly every one of this number testifie to sins forgiven.

At the close, the pastors interrup ted Dr. Strause, and read a series o resolutions warmly applauding hi work. The document was signe by Rev. C. J. Coulter, Pastor Northside Baptist Church; J. F. Harris, Pastor Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church; Rev. W. F. Fricke, Pastor Twenty-seventh Avenue German M. E. Church; Rev. J. E. Pickett, Pastor Highland Christian Church; Rev. James H. Speer, North Presbyterian Church; Rev. S. H. Slutz, Pastor Argo Methodist Episcopal Church; Rev. S. Krupp, Berkeley M. E. Church.

After the reading of the resolution, Dr. Harris, on behalf of the fourteen pastors, presented Dr. Strause with a very handsome silver loving cup, inscribed with their love and appreciation.

All the districts report great meetings, and it is estimated that more than five thousand have confessed Christ. ONE OF THE PASTORS.

The Altar in the Home

I write to acknowledge receipt of your valuable premiums, Family Worship and the Calendar. As regards the Calendar, let me say that we have four of your Calendars hanging in the same room, and that for 1905 is by far the most beautiful of the four. As regards the book Family Worship, let me say a word: The morning after its arrival, we began to use it for morning worship, and found its beautiful selections most inspiring and helpful. We are delighted with it, and trust that as the days and weeks go by, we shall find it very useful in the morning services, for which we intend making use of it.

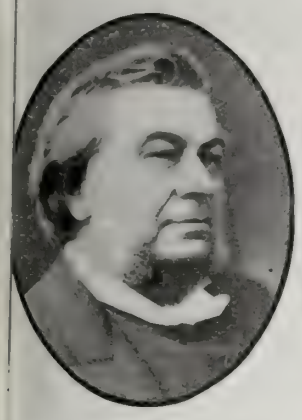
A TEN-STORY CHURCH

BY REV. F. STANLEY VAN EPS

See Illustration on First Page

A DECIDED novelty as a church building is rapidly nearing completion in New York City. It is the new home of the Broadway Tabernacle Church, whose former place of worship was so long a famous centre of Christian work and influence, at the intersection of Broadway, Sixth Avenue, and Thirty-fourth Streets. As explained in a previous number of this journal, that site was needed for business purposes, and a sum was offered for it so large that the trustees did not feel justified in rejecting the offer. It was realized that the work of the church could be continued in the near neighborhood under better conditions, in a more modern building. A site was accordingly purchased at Broadway and Fifty-sixth Street, and plans were made for the erection of a commodious structure which should contain all the modern facilities for church work.



DR. WILLIAM M. TAYLOR

The new building is a cathedral-like edifice, constructed on the principles of a modern skyscraper, combining beauty and utility in a high degree. The architects, Messrs. Barney & Chapman, have succeeded in adapting the style of the sixteenth century French Gothic to the needs of the Congregational Church of the present day.

The church proper is the auditorium in the west end of the building. The main entrance is flanked by a low tower on each side, and over it is a bass relief representing the Sermon on the Mount. Entering here, the visitor finds himself in a large vestibule, with doors leading to four aisles, which lead down an incline to the pulpit. There is a large gallery at the west end of the auditorium, and one in each transept, which are supported by steel girders without pillars. The high vaulted ceiling and the walls are all cream-white, trimmed with pale gray. The pews are arranged in front of the pulpit, so that there is no central aisle. Thus the speaker has his audience in such a relation that there is no obstruction of sight or sound.

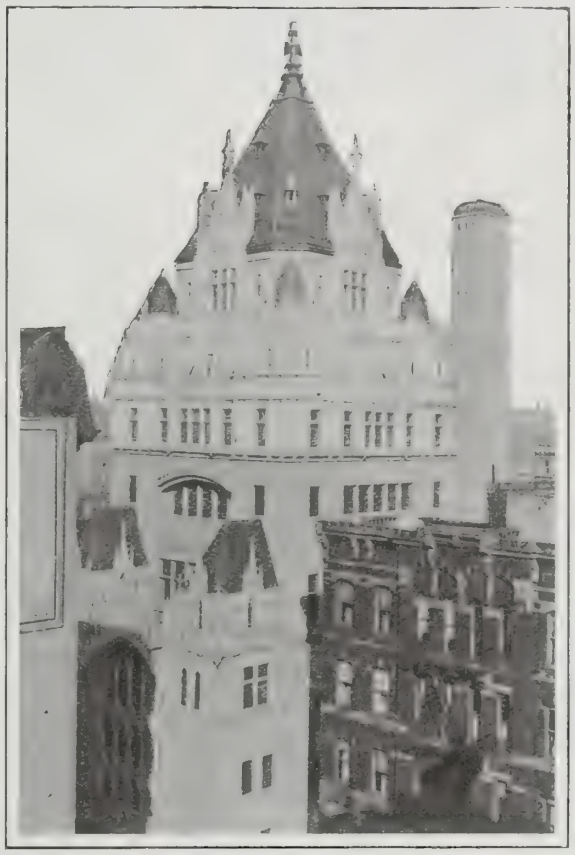
There is an abundance of light by day from the great windows on the sides and the west end, and at night a great central chandelier with one hundred and eight incandescent lamps, and three smaller chandeliers of similar design, besides many more side lamps, will pour a flood of electric light through the spacious room. The pulpit is raised upon a platform, the choir behind and at each side, accommodating about sixty. Back of this and higher, is the great organ, which will be fitted with electric apparatus.

Over the main vestibule is a large room for the trustees, and the financial business of the church. Connected with this by means of a stairway leading down, is a roomy safety-deposit vault, in which the records and all other valuables of the church are to be kept.

At the left of the main entrance is a chapel for weddings and other small gatherings, which is named in memory of a former pastor, Thompson Chapel. It will be a gem in decoration suited to its purpose.

Beneath the main auditorium is Pilgrim Hall. It is a complete auditorium, seating about six hundred people. This will be finished when required by the development of the work. No attempt will be made to render the Tabernacle an institutional church. Dr. Jefferson wishes to have a place in which any good cause may have an opportunity and a place to be heard, a hall that can be hired at a nominal sum to cover expenses. The first Tabernacle was far-famed for the world-moving meetings which were held there. This may be the starting-point of some new and great movements which will lift humanity to a higher level of life and development.

The ten-story part of the edifice is an interesting and imposing structure. The main entrance is on Fifty-sixth Street, leading into a corridor, such as one sees in an office-building. At the left, as we enter, is a passage opening into the main auditorium; here also is a steel and slate stairway, leading to the Sunday School room, the gallery of the auditorium, the gallery of Taylor Chapel, down to the pulpit and the choir, to the choir room and the choir music library, besides the committee room. Down in the corridor again, is the coat-room, and beyond we come to the elevator shaft and the stairway about it. On the right of the corridor, as we enter, is the sexton's office; and next are several doors into Taylor Chapel, a commodious room for the mid-week and other meetings; the lecture room, seating about three hundred and fifty persons. It is well lighted from the windows on the north and the south. Electric fixtures will make it brilliant at night.



THE TEN-STORY ELEVATION

In the basement below are the boiler room, the organ and heating and ventilating machinery in their proper places; and later, the kitchen and social hall, with all their attachments and conveniences, will be here located. As one passes from place to place in this lower region, it all seems as if he were in a commercial building rather than an ecclesiastical building.

Passing up the elevator, we alight at the Sunday School room, which is a large central room, with a row of class rooms on the same floor, and another row on the floor above, all opening into the central room. Here are fourteen rooms that can be made one.

The next floor is subdivided into various parlors and other rooms required for the women's work in all its branches. As this tower part is practically fifty feet square, some idea can be formed of the spacious quarters which will be found in it on each floor. Going higher, we are on the Men's floor, which will be subdivided to accommodate the various clubs and other work which the men may be carrying on as their especial part in the activity of the Church.

DR. JOSEPH P. THOMPSON

Still farther upward is the Administration floor, which will be arranged to provide room for the pastor's study and his office, and rooms for his assistants. Every convenience will be found here for the executive part of the work, at the side of the pastor at all times. The sexton will be provided with a complete "flat" on the floor above, which is the eighth from the ground.

The two floors above are to be used at a future time as a museum, when the relics and trophies of the church become more numerous. This novel feature will afford a place for such articles as may be sent by missionaries from their various fields of labor.

The heating and ventilating department is perfect, for on this the architects have put forth great ingenuity and care. In the basement are huge rotary fans, driven by electric dynamos, which will force the fresh air from the room into which it comes through a succession of screens, and is filtered up over the steam coils, through the ducts, and into the main auditorium.

The materials of which the building is constructed are; the steel skeleton, pale bricks, terra cotta of pale gray, fireproof tiles, the Manhattan system of floors, which consists of wires suspended from the steel beams a few inches apart, and the intervening space filled in with a composition of plaster and asbestos.

The Church has had a remarkable history. It originated in the preaching of Rev. Chas. G. Finney, the eminent revivalist, and its first home was the Chatham Street theatre, which was dedicated as a church in 1832. Four years later the new Tabernacle, built according to Dr. Finney's plan, was dedicated, and he was installed, but resigned the next year. After varied experiments this Church disintegrated, and the building was sold under mortgage. Then the present organization was formed, July 6, 1840, was recognized by council Sept. 3, and called, in October, Rev. E. W. Andrews, who was installed the next January as the first pastor. Its next pastor was Rev. Joseph P. Thompson, under whom the Church developed, and sent out offshoots into other parts of the city and Brooklyn. It built the famous edifice at Broadway and Thirty-fourth Street in 1859. Dr. Thompson's health broke down in 1871, under his manifold labors, and he reluctantly resigned his charge. The Church then called Dr. William M. Taylor, under whom it enjoyed twenty years of uninterrupted prosperity. Dr. Taylor's death was deeply mourned by his devoted people. He was succeeded by Dr. Henry A. Stimson, whose pastorate was short. In 1898 the present pastor, Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, began his ministry, and under his guidance the Church is maintaining the reputation of its youth and extending its influence.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A. R. S., Ohio. "The Lord has answered my prayer, and He will answer all if we only trust him."

Mrs. A. W. H., Vermont. "I know God answers prayer, and the verse 'I will neither leave nor forsake thee,' is a great help in dark hours."

A. N., South Carolina. "I was in deep trouble, and feared through it all the loss of a dear one's mind. I cried continually unto God, who heard and delivered me."

A Subscriber. "I believe the Lord will answer our prayer if it is for the best, and we ask in faith. I always read the Answered Prayers, and my faith has been strengthened by them."

M. E. R., Pa. "The Lord recently saved my brother, for whom we have long been praying, and also restored me from a severe illness. I have been greatly encouraged by reading the columns of Answers to Prayer."

H. P. H., Mich. "My heart is full of gratitude and thanksgiving to God for the blessings of answered prayer. All my life he has helped me through all trials, sorrows, and cares."

O GOD, I pray that thou wilt guide
My life, for thou alone can's't bless;
Teach me thy law of holiness;
O Lord, be ever at my side.

Lead me by rays of heavenly light
That ever round my God do shine,
That I may know the One divine,
And follow in His steps aright.

If sorrow I am forced to bear,
I pray that Thou wilt with me be;
That, too, I know must come from Thee,
I cannot get beyond Thy care.

And tho' to err may be my lot,
My body unto sin be lent,
Yet to Thy law I do consent,
The good I would that do I not.

I know in every age and land,
The soul that liveth in Thy fear,
That answers Thee, "Lord, I am here,"
Is guided by Thy kindly hand.

Who justly deals with all mankind,
Whose hand is turned to mercy still,
Who seeks to know Thy holy will,
And walks with Thee in humble mind.

Whose life is free from passions wild,
Who looks with pity on distress
Of widows and the fatherless,
Can never cease to be Thy child.

To Thee, O Lord, I pray again,
Teach me to see in those that bleed
For human wrongs the noblest creed,
The love of Him that died for men.

A Reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. "I want to acknowledge God's love and mercy in hearing and answering prayers in times of trouble."

The Church's Business

OUR readers will be interested in the description on another page of the modern church edifice that is being erected in New York. It represents the newest and best architectural thought of our times, and will doubtless serve as a model for new church buildings in other cities. It deserves a welcome from Christians of all denominations. Christ should have the best that can be devised. The building that is dedicated to his service, ought to be at least as graceful and as well adapted to its purpose as those that our millionaires erect for their own occupation.

It is a significant fact that this church had its origin in a revival. It was the famous evangelistic movement led by the Rev. Charles G. Finney, that gave the first impulse to the work which is now to be so splendidly housed. There could be no better beginning for any Church. The salvation of souls deserves the very highest memorial, and it should be a constant memorial all through its history. That is the main business for which the Church exists. No matter how wealthy or how aristocratic a church may be, it fails of its mission if it is not a place in which souls are saved. The fig-tree that our Lord cursed, because it bore nothing but leaves, did not fail in its purpose more conspicuously than does a church of fine architecture, beautiful organ and efficient choir, if it is not bearing fruit in winning souls for Christ. Crowds of worshipers and financial prosperity count for nothing in his sight in any church, if it does not become the birthplace of souls.

How slowly has the work of regenerating the world proceeded! We have the same old Gospel which has proved effective in millions of cases, we have all the apparatus, we have able preachers and unlimited means, yet the cities are not saved. Is it not time that the Church bestir itself, and ask whether its methods are wrong, or what is amiss in its spirit, that the people around it are still indifferent? Nineteen centuries have passed since Christ gave his commission to his Church, yet, even now, how comparatively few are his ostensible followers, and, among them, how small a proportion know by actual experience the real meaning of his salvation! It is useless to apportion the blame between ministers and church members. The one should help the other.

If the value of the soul was appreciated as it ought to be, if the effectiveness of the remedy for sin that exists in the Cross was realized, there would be, on all hands, a determination and an energetic effort that would be blessed of God to the conversion of multitudes. Not until individual responsibility is felt on all sides, and an earnest and prayerful endeavor is made to fulfil it, will the Church be the light of the world that Christ intended it to be.

Light Breaks in Russia

AFTER storm the sunshine. Russia's stormy experience gives presage of fairer weather near at hand. Forced to serious consideration of the situation, the Czar has done two things which may yet go very far toward restoring the confidence of his people. He has received a deputation of the workers in his palace, and promised liberal reforms; and he has delegated to M. de Witte, President of the Committee of Ministers, and M. Yermoloff, Minister of Agriculture and State Domains, in conjunction with other members of the Imperial Council, the task of framing a Constitution for the Russian people. Such is the news that comes to us from apparently reliable sources. Indeed, it is even stated that, with his own hand, the Czar has already signed the draft of a Constitution, under which the people will be represented by an Assembly, elected by their votes, and which will have a voice in the affairs of the nation.

It is yet too early to form a judgment as to the precise character and scope of the concessions granted by the throne in response to the popular demand if, indeed, they have been granted at all. Whatever they may prove to be, it is certain that they must have been wrung from the imperial power, notwithstanding the bitter opposition encountered from Nicholas' late advisers, the Grand Dukes and their autocratic cabal. It must have been no common ordeal through which the Czar passed, when he broke loose from their baneful influence and let his heart speak, and his better nature once more assert itself in a righteous and reasonable attitude toward his people.

Well will it be for Emperor Nicholas and for Russia, if he remains firm in his new-found purpose, and performs faithfully his new resolve to grant to the nation a constitutional government. This once secured, other reforms will speedily follow. Already there are intimations of better labor laws, a greater freedom of the press, and a withdrawal of the censorship. Freedom of political assemblage, and freedom of worship, are yet no doubt far ahead; but even to these the Russian people may look forward hopefully under a constitutional government.

Should Nicholas II. prove true to his pledge, he may yet be acclaimed by a forgiving people as one of their greatest benefactors. The lives of those who died in the recent struggle will not have been sacrificed in vain. They will be remembered as the martyrs over whose bodies the people marched to national independence.

Evangeline Booth

FOR the first time in the history of religious movements in this country, a woman, young, talented and of undeniable ability, stands at the head of one of the greatest moral agencies of our day. Evangeline Booth, the new leader of the Salvation Army in America, has a heritage of consecrated genius, a noble presence, and a heart filled with enthusiasm for her mission. A leader of her sex, she is also a leader of men, and her eloquence, no less than her executive ability, have already been widely recognized in her new field of action. To the management of what is probably the largest and the most important wing of the Army in any part of the world, she brings a ripe experience and a godly zeal worthy of a veteran.

Yet withal she is full of womanly sympathy, and as quick to respond to the call of suffering, as she is to take the field under the banner of "Blood and Fire" against open sin. It was her quick brain that first conceived the plan of helping the thousands of poor children of the tenements who go to school breakfastless and hungry every morning. Within twenty-four hours after she learned the truth about these little unfortunates, she had opened a half dozen free breakfast stations, and was feeding soup, bread, coffee and milk to hundreds of famished children. Within a week, thousands of tenement boys and girls were gratefully accepting from her hand their morning meal, and murmuring with childish lips a blessing upon their "Little Mother."

Miss Booth's promptness in meeting this emergency does credit alike to her heart and brain. It was a stroke of real generalship, worthy of a scion of the founder of the Salvation Army. Like other radical measures, it may be criticized by those who can claim that Miss Booth, being a stranger, cannot by any possibility be sufficiently familiar with conditions here to form a proper judgment; but the fact remains that she found existing conditions of a character that admitted of no argument, and which could only be met as she met them—by bread. All theorizing is wasted in the presence of absolute hunger. "When I saw these children," said Miss Booth, "I immediately felt that the only thing to do was to put the kettle on, and make soup." That, with good bread, and both in abundance, was the only solution she knew.

We are glad that the "Little Mother" of the Salvation Army has signalized the assumption of her new command by an act so worthy and so womanly. It is better than a score of pronunciamentos dealing with principles and creed. It proves to the world that the platform of the Salvation Army is far more than creed—it is action, helpfulness, kindness, Christ-like humanity. It reaches out to the very poor, the churchless, the suffering, the outcast, the homeless; it searches highways and byways, lanes and alleys, for those who sorely need some cheering message, and some kindly, and by no means empty, hand to brighten their dull lives. It wins multitudes from sin to clean, Christian lives. It gathers resources to scatter again, and by scattering it increases. There is hardly a phase of philanthrophy which it does not touch. Society ha long ago ceased to pick up its skirts and pass the Arm disdainfully by; for society has been won over, and ha itself pulled down the barrier of exclusiveness, and no recognizes the Salvation Army as one of the poten moral and social factors of our day. European mon archs have granted audience to the Army's founder and our own President opens wide the White Hous doors to Evangeline Booth, as the head of the Army i America. The day of the Salvation Army has come and it is filled with the promise of a glorious and usefu future.

The Cheerfulness of Childhood

MUCH has been said and written of the faith and trust of a little child, and many a traveler along life's way has yearned for that confidence and reliance he sees in such completeness in his children, and which was his in the long ago. That trust in the All-Wise he fain would have, even as his little ones trust their earthly father.

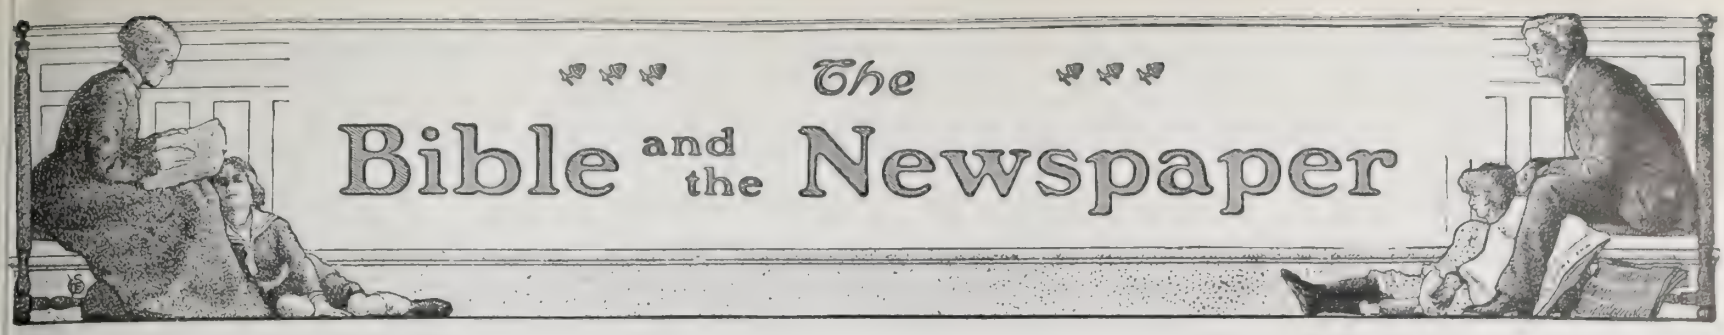
But in the lessons taught by our children, there is none better worth heeding than their unfailing cheerfulness, often under the most discouraging conditions and circumstances. Considering the lives and surroundings of some little souls, it seems a wise dispensation that it takes so little to make a child happy. This is instanced in the case of the children of the weaver mothers in Fall River, and other mill towns. When there is no strike on, these mothers walk up and down between the looms for ten or more hours every day, toiling amid the clattering, deafening noise of the machinery, in the moist, foul atmosphere of the weaving room. At night they go home exhausted; but then there is the housework to be done, the little children to be fed, and poor mites of anæmic babies to nurse. One might naturally think that children born and reared under such unhealthy and miserable conditions would never smile, and that cheerfulness would be unknown. But it takes so little to make a child happy! It took only three potatoes to make a little Portuguese schoolgirl as cheerful as a lark, not long ago. The vegetables had been used at school by the teacher for a demonstration, and were lying upon her desk. The little girl came and begged for them to take home to her mother, who had had nothing to eat during the day, for many of these poor mothers feed their children and go without food themselves. The child went home with shining eyes, as she clasped the roots close to her ragged little jacket, and tripped cheerfully to mother.

Another little girl was offered a pair of shoes, which some kind-hearted people were giving to the poor people during the strike. "No," she smilingly said, "I don't need them, but she does," pointing to another girl, whose toes, red and cold, were sticking through her torn shoes. "Give 'em to her." At the same time her own feet were wet; the miserable shoes she wore were soaked through and through. Both children were as happy and cheerful as if at home there was full and plenty of clothing, warmth and food, while the truth was, there was very little of either. "Yes, Mamie's always bright and laughin,' even if she is hungry," said one poor mother. "She keeps us all up, sayin' as how when the strike is over, we will have all we want."

These children gladly leave school that they may go into the mills and help out the slender income of the family. They do not realize the sacrifice they are making—that knowledge will come later—when they will then understand how they were robbed of the happy, care-free joyousness which is the birthright of every child, even from the humblest walk in life. As the Lord loves a cheerful countenance, so we may bless the bonny smile and cheer of a little child.

Among the Workers

—The America Inland Mission (or Society of Soul-Winners), has its headquarters at Wilmore, near Lexington. It has this year some sixty-five faithful preachers and teachers in the destitute mountain regions of Kentucky, Virginia, North Carolina and Tennessee. It is undenominational and evangelical. The President, Rev. Dr. Edward O. Guerrant, Wilmore, Ky., will give all information to inquirers concerning its work.



Russian Difficulties

SLOWLY, and with diplomatic deliberation, the International Arbitration Court, appointed to deal with the North Sea outrage, is proceeding in its investigation. The questions it has to decide, are whether there were among the English fishing fleet any Japanese torpedo boats; whether the manœuvres of the fishing boats were of a character to alarm the commander of the Russian fleet, and lead him to suppose that an attack on him was intended; and whether, if both these suppositions are disproved, the Russian Government should pay compensation for the losses incurred. The Court, which holds its sessions in Paris, consists of five admirals; Admiral Kaznakov, representing Russia; Beaumont, representing England: Fournier, representing France; Davis, representing the United States; and Spaun, representing Austria. As Great Britain asked our Government to appoint a judge, the Russians selected a Frenchman, it being supposed that in each case the judge would be likely to be favorable to the nominating Power. These four were required to choose a fifth, and the selection fell on the Austrian. The time since the assembling of the Court on January 19, has been devoted to the testimony of witnesses, both from the fishing fleet and the Russian squadron. The counsel for Great Britain, Sir Edward Fry, and the Russian counsel, Baron Taube, are now to present their summing up.

The Russian and Japanese armies in the north are clearly struggling for a strategic position before beginning the battle which will doubtless prove the decisive battle of the war. The Russians attacked the Japanese position at Heikoulai and drove them out, but the Japanese received reinforcements, and after five days almost continuous fighting, in a blinding snow-storm, they succeeded in regaining their position. The effort of the Russians appears to be to roll back the left wing of the Japanese army on its centre, but Gen. Oyama, who is a skilful strategist, apparently understands the object of the movement and has prevented it. More reinforcements are being sent foward from Russia as fast as the railroad can carry them. Pitiful scenes are witnessed in Russia as the recruits are driven from their villages to start for the front. The women, who well know how little prospect there is of their ever seeing their husbands and sons again, fling themselves on the ground sobbing and weeping over the parting.

How much sorrow and suffering and loss of life would have been saved to both nations, if, instead of rushing into war, such a Commission as that now sitting in Paris, had been appointed to decide the questions at issue. The time will come when all disputes will be thus settled by unimpeachable authority:

For out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many peoples (Isaiah 2: 3, 4).

THE NORTH SEA INQUIRY COMMISSION NOW SITTING IN PARIS

A Volcanic Eruption

News was brought to San Francisco on Feb. 2, by the steamer Sydney, of the sudden outbreak of a volcano which had long been regarded as extinct. Awakening from a sleep of fifteen years, the great volcano of Momotombo, on the northwest shore of Lake Managua, in Nicaragua, suddenly burst into tremendous fury. The Sydney was in the port of Corinto, Nicaragua, at the time. From her decks, the volcano and its display of fire and smoke were plainly visible. It is believed that great destruction of property, and the loss of many lives among the natives around the base of the volcano resulted. Monotombo is thirty miles in the interior from Corinto, and is a conical peak 4,000 feet high. The day was clear, and there was no wind blowing, when a tongue of flame, that appeared to be five hundred feet long, shot from Monotombo's apex. With it, but mounting straight up, arose a cloud of jet black smoke, which soon covered the sky. Perhaps the loss of life may not be so great as is feared. It is inconceivable that many people should have had the temerity to live in so dangerous a place. Yet we know that there are many who are heedless in a case where destruction is certain.

Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be (II. Peter 3: 11).

SOLDIERS' WIVES LAMENTING THEIR HUSBANDS' DEPARTURE

A Test for Gems

The difficulty of detecting imitation jewels has, it is reported, been effectually overcome. A chemist who has been deeply interested in the Roentgen Rays, noticed in one of his experiments that a ring on the hand of a person who was put under the rays, showed dark and well-defined in the photograph, while another ring on the same hand showed the setting dark, but the stone indistinct. In appearance the stones were alike, but it was evident that one was false. Acting on this clue, the chemist has perfected the system. He uses a quick plate, encased in an orange envelope, covered by three folds of heavy, black paper. Every kind of stone has been tested, including pearls, diamonds, rubies, sapphires and amethysts. Mixed with them were the best imitation stones that could be procured, some of which were so good, that they had been pronounced genuine by experts. In the photograph, there is hardly a trace of the genuine stones, but the false stones are all black, and leave sharp, well defined silhouettes on the plate. In every case the image of the genuine jewel is faint and can scarcely be seen, and the gold claws show clear and black through the stone. The test will be exceedingly valuable, because it is actual demonstration and not mere opinion. It is so with character in the light of heaven. The sinner is self convicted.

But all things that are reproved are made manifest by the light: for whatsoever doth make manifest is light (Eph. 5:13).

Insurance in Question

A peculiar case involving the payment of life insurance, has been decided by a judge of the United States Circuit Court, at Pittsburg, Pa. It has been watched with keen interest by every insurance company in the country. It appears that a mining engineer applied for an insurance with the company for $25,000. He was examined by the company's doctor and accepted. The policy was duly issued to him, and nothing remained to be done but to pay the first year's premium. Before that was done, the man died. His widow tendered payment of the premium, but the insurance company refused to accept it, on the ground that it ought to have been paid before the man died. Suit was thereupon brought to compel payment. The company contended that it had not incurred any obligation until it had received payment of the premium, while the widow contended that the granting of the policy was an obligation which she completed. The decision of the court was in favor of the widow. This may be only a stage in the litigation. The case will probably be appealed. What expense and harass might have been spared to the widow had the man paid his premium at the time. He intended to insure and the company was willing to insure him, but it is doubtful if the transaction was completed. How many Christian workers are in similar doubt about converts, who die without giving evidence of decision for Christ. They intend to give themselves to him, but no one knows if they did.

Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth (Prov. 27: 1).

Dispute About a Coin

Experts in New York are at issue about the genuineness of a ten dollar gold piece, which was tendered in payment of a debt a few days ago. The coin is slightly discolored, and it is a little under proper weight. The man who received it was suspicious, and caused the arrest of the man who paid it to him. The Secret Service Agent to whom the coin was turned over, sent it to a down-town bank and to the Sub-Treasury. The bank experts said it was genuine; those at the Sub-Treasury insisted that it was counterfeit. The agent, who is himself an expert in detection of counterfeits, says that the coin was Government made, but believes that it has been tampered with. "It has been subjected to a 'sweating' process," he said, "and reduced in weight about a tenth. The color also, is very peculiar, but it can be attributed to the use of silver as an alloy, which was the custom in 1849, the date that the coin bears." In view of the difference of expert opinion, the charge against the man was withdrawn. It seems probable that the coin is not a counterfeit, but is suspected on account of the character of its alloy. It is so with some Christians who are scarcely known to be Christians because of the alloy of the world in their natures. They need the process which God will surely apply.

I will turn my hand upon thee and purge away thy dross and take away all thy tin (Isa. 1: 25).

The People and the President

More Letters of High Commendation from Eminent Americans Who Have Read "The Christian Herald" Symposium

EVERY mail brings us letters from men and women prominent in public affairs in various States, discussing the recent publication in these pages of the remarkable Symposium on the question, "What thing is most to be desired by the American people during the coming four years of President Roosevelt's Administration?" These letters come from all parts of the country, and are significant as showing the widespread interest the Symposium has aroused among thoughtful people who have the best interests of the nation at heart.

Several of the letters are given below:

Hopes the Symposium May Help Good Legislation

LET us hope that the publication of your Symposium entitled, "The People and the President," may, during the coming four years of Theodore Roosevelt's Administration, produce such harmony between the executive and legislative branches of the government as will result in the passage of wise laws for the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce.

That the great work of the construction of the Panama Canal may be pushed vigorously forward to completion.

That capital and labor may find common ground on which they can work in harmony.

That peace and plenty may bless the people of the nation.

That each may realize more than ever before his obligation to the country.

That selfish strife may make way for patriotic endeavor.

That such a state of confidence may grow up and continue between the people and the President as will aid him in his efforts to promote among the masses a stronger determination for the establishment of universal peace, the spread of a broader liberty, and a new desire for equal justice and equal responsibility.

MARTIN B. MADDEN.
Member of Congress, 1st Ill. Dist.

An Influence for the Public Good

Such efforts as these are potentially influential for public good, and you are entitled to sincere thanks for the enterprise shown in collecting so admirable a Symposium, of such vital and absorbing interest.

Control of Corporations the Urgent Need

In my opinion, the most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration, is an increase of control by the Federal Government over corporate (especially railroad) interests, thereby lessening the evils of trusts and monopolies. Putting corporations, as well as railroads engaged in interstate commerce under some form of Federal control, would, in my opinion, lessen many of the evils now being endured by the general public. The consummation of so worthy an object ought to be sufficient inspiration for any Administration.

JOHN J. ESCH.
Member of Congress.

Will Benefit the Whole People

I appreciate your efforts in getting expressions from "eminent Americans" of events most to be desired during the Administration of President Roosevelt, and believe it will be a great benefit to our people. I am particularly interested in our new possessions, and sincerely hope our government will fully realize and improve the golden opportunity thrust upon it, by establishing schools, industries and churches, and thereby civilize, Americanize and evangelize them. It will not only benefit them, but be an untold blessing to us.

J. H. WILSON, Mayor of Cohoes.
Cohoes, N. Y.

Has Confidence in the President

Upon reading your Symposium, I do not perceive that I could make any addition thereto.

I have great confidence that the President will meet his responsibilities with intelligence, courage, and disinterestedness; and I have high hopes that his sympathies are deep and broad enough to meet the needs of the entire American people.

A. J. MONTAGUE, Governor of Virgina.

Spread It Throughout the Nation

I have read with deep interest the several and widely-differing answers, and find them nearly as varied as the professions to which they belong and positions they occupy. I commend this "short cut" to reach the leading minds, and trust THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will follow up the inquiry, till hundreds of our strongest have answered the question. The completed answers, then, brought together in printed form for sale and distribution, calling attention to the point of nearest agreement, etc., would help much in directing matters for the next four years.

A. R. WEBBER, Member of Congress.
Washington, D. C.

Mrs. Roosevelt's Good Influence

The copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing the Symposium entitled, "The People and the President," is at hand. Such efforts will undoubtedly do much good.

Permit me to say a few words concerning the President's wife, who is, in my opinion, "the power behind the throne." She has certainly maintained her dignity as mistress in the White House in a marvelous and most unobtrusive manner; has brought the wives of the public officials together for consultation as never before; and has elevated the tone of social life in Washington. Better than this even, she is a most devoted mother, and holds the standard of womanhood high above all other claims. No mistress of the White House has to my knowledge performed so much genuine work for others, without any ostentatious parade or constant notice in the public prints. Mrs. Roosevelt is the first President's wife who has not been personally known to me for years; and I have followed her course in the White House with admiration and sincere respect.

Salem, Mass. KATE TANNATT WOODS.

States National Questions Admirably

I have enjoyed reading the Symposium very much. I think it an admirable way to arouse interest in national questions. Without interest, our people will not concern themselves with the questions of the day, and even when deeply interested, they are often unable to see the bearing of this or that national movement (assured or projected), and look to the leaders of the country for an indication of how this or that should be decided or construed. In putting before them these opinions of thinking and leading men, you are furnishing the thing most needed to make them realize the national peril, and use their influence to avert evil.

Being much interested in the arbitration treaties, I have recently written some letters to Washington in regard to them, which have been promptly and satisfactorily answered by our Kentucky Senators.

WM. H. HARRISON,
Russellville, Ky. President Bethel College.

Capital and Labor Should Harmonize

In answer to your query as to "What is the most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration," I would say, "A clearer understanding of sound economic conditions in the United States." I believe that such an understanding would reveal to the workingmen the line beyond which their effort to benefit themselves injures the industrial organizations on which they must rely for wages, and results in injury not only to themselves but to the community at large. This understanding, too, would, I think, bring about checks to the over-capitalization, which is responsible in so many ways for evils in the industrial world, which are laid to trusts and other huge aggregations of capital. This understanding would also, I believe, lead to the creation of an American mercantile marine, without which we cannot secure that share of the world's commerce which, from our position and facilities, should be ours. I believe, too, that this understanding would tend to separate business from politics, to the advantage of the former and to the purification of the latter, so that the transaction of public business would be on a higher plane, and unhampered by narrow and conflicting selfish interests.

I am sure, too, that a better understanding of existing conditions will show the advisability of the establishment of the principle of arbitration, as is proposed by pending treaties, which, if ratified, will remove many dangers of long continued international misunderstanding, with consequent disturbance of the business affairs of the nation.

I do not know that there could be a better wish for the future, than that capital and labor should work in harmony; that great financial affairs should be honestly administered; that we should be in a position to secure all the benefits from our labors that are due to us; that we have the assurance that the laws under which we live are the results of wise statesmanship, and not the resultants of the most powerful of the selfish forces of the community, and that we may have no fear of international complications over questions of fact that can be settled by impartial judges.

The Ballot Should be Purified

A thing more to be desired than all is the purification of the ballot, the suppression of graft, and the education of public sentiment to a higher and holier regard for the ballot box as the veritable palladium of liberty and the only safe assurance of the perpetuation of republican free government. The alarmingly increasing violation of its sanctity and prostitution to the basest uses of selfishness and greed through the use of money for bribery and graft is degrading and debauching public and personal morals and tends to lower the standard and quality of official action, thus at once threatening the destruction both of the people and their government, and thus becoming the most vital question of the hour.

Real Statesmanship Needed

A proper appreciation of the fact that this is a great country—great in territory and diversified interest—and that the welfare of the people is and should be paramount to the interest of any individual or concern, coupled with acute ideas of right and wrong, combined with courage to do the right, are elements of a real statesman—the kind of men the people need in positions of power and influence.

An Expression of National Character

This kind of Symposium has the value of being the expression of the ideals of practical people who believe their ideals capable of early realization. The hopes that these enlightened men and women express, however, are valuable not only as an inventory of what sensible people believe we may reasonably hope to accomplish, but they are chiefly valuable because they express what a great many people hope for, and therefore, under a republican form of government, may attain. This Symposium is valuable, then, as translating into concrete form, public aspiration.

Instantaneous communication now makes all the reading world think of the same things at the same time. The telegraph, telephone, and increasing postal facilities, have strung cities, towns and farms like ganglia upon a national nerve system, and the concentrated and co-operating aspiration of a large number of people in a government of the people may rapidly translate itself into reality.

Nothing can stand against an aroused public opinion, and within reasonable bounds nothing is impossible to an aroused national aspiration.

But while this is true of nobler aspirations, it is true in lesser degree of more ignoble tendencies. No man is better than his ideals and no nation is better than its ideals. This Symposium is valuable also, then, as an expression of national character.

Irrigate the Desert Lands

In my judgment, this feature is of pronounced benefit to the people of the United States, since it brings all great questions before them in a direct and forcible manner.

From a Western point of view, the most desirable thing to be hoped for by the American people during the four years of President Roosevelt's Administration, is the completion of dams, whereby great quantities of flood waters may be stored for use upon desert lands. The strengthening of our nation where it is weakest must appeal to all as a question of national equity and probity. The millions of acres of irrigable lands throughout the West and Southwest, now lying dormant and wasteful, should be made to yield their just share of the nation's wealth, and it only remains for the ingenuity of mankind to correct the deplorable conditions. The extension of work in this direction, already begun by the general government, is of vital importance to the great West and Southwest.

ALEXANDER O. BRODIE.
Governor of Arizona.

"Peace and Prosperity"

That which I believe is most desired by the people of the United States during the next four years, is peace and prosperity, with an equal opportunity for all. That which is most needed in order that this may be brought about is legislation that will effectually protect the majority of the people of this country from the oppression of a powerful, unscrupulous minority, and that this may be accomplished the President should have sufficient votes in Congress to carry out his plans to give "every man a square deal." We need honest, unselfish men in both elective and appointive offices; men who have the welfare of their country at heart rather than the service of their own personal interests, or those of a few influential friends.

WILLIAM W. COCKS,
Washington, D. C. Member of Congress.

Law, Not War, Should Prevail

I think to read such expressions of opinion must be helpful. One subject discussed is of especial interest to me, and that is universal arbitration, and consequent peace. I am strongly opposed to war, and I think there should be a court of arbitration to settle the difference of nations, as there is to settle those of individuals. Law, not war, it seems to me should prevail throughout the world.

Boston, Mass. LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.

Will Make a Lasting Impression

Your Symposium, entitled, "The People and the President," will, I am sure, make a lasting impression on all who have read the timely suggestions contained therein. I sincerely believe that the coming Administration will mark a period of purer political conditions, and that the time may yet come when political integrity will keep pace with business integrity. President Roosevelt stands for a courageous political integrity. The people have a right to demand it. May we not all profit, in a more or less degree, from President Roosevelt's example.

In bringing before the people the great questions which have been so intelligently discussed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, you are certainly a very potent factor in the advancement of the welfare of this nation and the whole world.

Washington, D. C. W. AUBREY THOMAS,
Member of Congress.

Are We Drifting Away from the Fundamentals?

I have a growing conviction that the public at large, and even many of our institutions of learning, are drifting away from some of the fundamentals, considered so vital by the fathers who brought our country into being. There is danger of breaking away from the old moorings, unless the most capable and the most thoughtful of our public and professional men are called upon from time to time to give their views upon the questions of the day, and urge a higher type of citizenship and higher standards of justice.

Raleigh, N. C. CHARLES FRANCIS MESERVE, President Shaw University.

A Great Educational Factor

I think it will be a big factor in enlightening and educating the public as to what laws are good for an advancing nation like ours. Take, for instance, the re-establishment of our merchant marine, of which I am heartily in favor of. I think it will take years before our Congress wakes up to the fact that it ought to be re-established at once, unless such periodicals as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD keeps pointing out the fact, that the millions of money that now go into the pockets of the people of other nations should go into the pockets of our people.

The riot that occurred in St. Petersburg, Russia, last Sunday, will never be possible in this country so long as papers like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD prints the best thoughts and words of our eminent citizens, as you have in the issue of January 11.

I am certain your great National Symposium will prove an excellent educator for the people.

ALEXANDER T. CONNELL,
Mayor of Scranton, Pa.

The Danger of an Autocracy of Wealth

Federal Legislation, reinforced by judicial procedure that will result in curbing the unbridled trusts, and checking the grasping greed of the unprincipled rich, will command the gratitude of the great mass of the people. Legalized robbery by the aid of lax corporate laws, should be made odious and impossible. Publicity is a partial remedy that must be secured by legal enactment. There is a day of retribution if the present situation continues much longer. The people will not always submit to the theft of their small savings. Wealth obtained by unclean methods must be made a stench in the nostrils of all men, rich and poor, high and low, and the unrighteously rich must be ostracized and driven from decent society. An autocracy is dangerous to the liberties of the people, whether it be of political power or wealth. America may take warning from the tragedy now being acted in Russia.

Makes One Proud of his Country

No true American can read the letters as printed in your Symposium, entitled, "The People and the President," without being proud of his country and without rejoicing in its splendid possibilities. Such expressions, coming as they do from the leading citizens of our country, and representing every phase of life, cannot fail to crystallize public sentiment in the right channel and result in great good to our people.

J. C. HARDY.
President Ag'l and Mech'l College, Miss.

Office a Sacred Stewardship

Let the country learn, in the next four years, the lesson of official honesty. Demand it from road overseer to the highest office within the people's gift; that real life means real work; that life is a sacred stewardship; that all our acts, individual and national, should be weighed upon the scales of our relationship to the happiness of our people.

These are great lessons our President has been trying upon all occasions to emphasize. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does a great work in trying to assist in the promulgation of these great principles.

U. S. Judge, Ind. Ter.

Other Opinions on the Symposium

Hon. J. C. Needham, Member of Congress from California, writes:

I desire to take this opportunity to congratulate you upon the article, and to say that in my opinion such articles are very valuable factors in the advancement of the public good.

Congressman Julius Kahn writes from San Francisco:

A publication of views of men prominent in the affairs of the nation is always instructive, and I desire to compliment you upon the enterprise you have shown.

Prof. John H. Race, President of Grant University, Tennessee, writes:

Such terse expressions from the eminent men of the country must necessarily furnish great inspiration to all the readers. The issue of January 11 must prove to be an influential factor for the advancement of the public good.

President E. D. Eaton, of Beloit College, Wis., writes:

Such expressions cannot fail to be of value in helping to form and develop a sound public sentiment, which is the basis of our national well-being.

President Booth C. Davis, of Alfred University, writes from Alfred, N. Y.:

I consider it of much value to the public, to place public officials before the attention of the people in a dignified and creditable light. Such work cannot fail to do good.

Judge W. T. Alexander, United States Court, Atlanta, Ga., writes:

It brings before the public clearly and succinctly matters which the best minds of the country deem important for public consideration. Such contributions as have recently been furnished you must be of great benefit, and are certainly highly interesting.

Governor S. H. Elrod, of South Dakota, writes from Pierre, as follows:

In my mind, the thing most to be desired by the American people during the coming four years of President Roosevelt's Administration is, that every man and every woman who has to toil, may have work every day, to the end that every person and every home may have all the necessities and comforts of life. That some visible progress may be made in harmonizing labor and capital. The pillars of this Republic are the men and women who toil, and they must be equitably dealt with. If a reasonable number of our financiers and capitalists would get together and work together along the lines followed by the late Senator Hanna, much good would be accomplished for the wage-earners of our country.

A number of other letters on the same subject will be noted in a later issue.

Doctors Versus Teachers

I AM so puzzled," writes a mother, "about my daughter Helen. She is so nervous, and so irritable, that she is almost hysterical, and the tears come to her eyes if I speak to her. I on't mean if I find fault with her, for I am very entle in my treatment of the child; but if I address er suddenly, or ask her where she has been, or whether he knows her lessons. Our doctor says: 'Take Helen ut of school for six months, and let her stay out of oors, and build up her strength.' But what is to beome of her education if she is to be interrupted within year of her graduation, and kept at home. The ther girls will get far ahead of her, and she will not ant to go back. I am puzzled; what do you advise?"

This mother is not solitary or singular in her bewilerment. The situation is not uncommon. Many girls t sixteen or seventeen find the demands of the physical nd the school life in conflict, and when the doctor is onsulted, he sensibly prescribes rest and change.

Teachers naturally deprecate the dropping out of lasses of pupils who are doing good ork, and who, from the pedagogical iew-point, are not overworked. Miss R———, who is principal of a high chool, and whose opportunities for tudying girls are multiplied, says hat the difficulty generally lies in the ome life, not in the school work. She has found over and over that girls ry to keep up a sort of social life that s unwise—receiving their boy friends n the evening, and going to parties nd companies which keeps them out f bed until midnight. She insists hat schoolgirls cannot spread their strength over too much space, and declares that a girl who does her work faithfully, loses no sessions, either half days or whole days, during a term, who eats good food, and retires at an early hour, seldom breaks down. She is very emphatic in her disapproval of the candy habit, and says that girls who nibble at sweets seldom eat their meals as they ought.

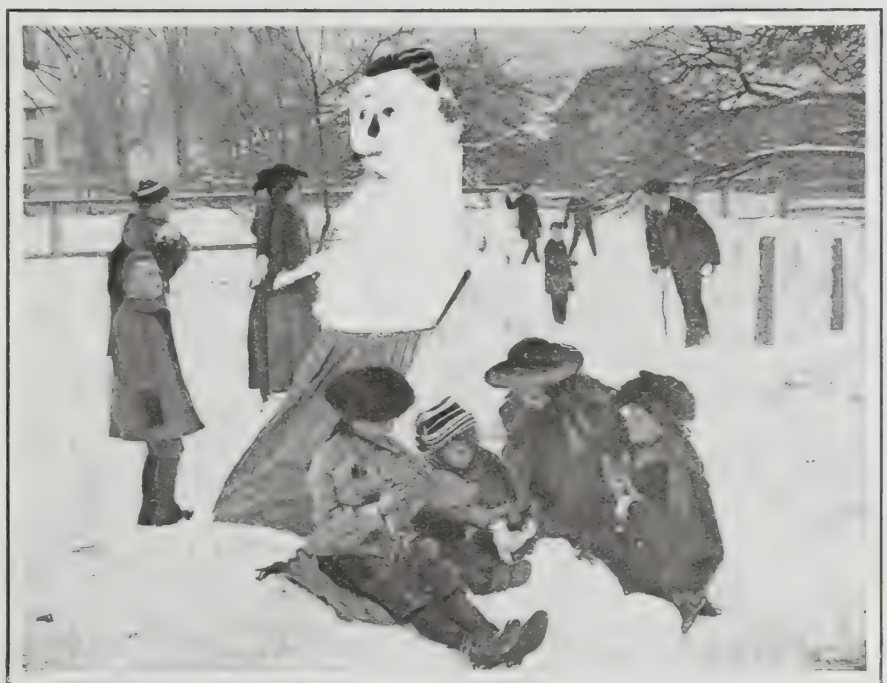
I advise Helen's mother to follow her physician's advice, if, and only if, Helen has been doing nothing but her school work. If Helen has been allowed too much social freedom, or too many sweets, it may be worth while to try what virtue there is in dieting and early hours. But, and this every mother should remember, if a girl's strength is not sufficient to keep her buoyant and cheery at sixteen, there is something very much amiss. How will she endure the later strain—that will come at twenty, at twenty-five and at thirty? It is much safer and far wiser to defer her graduation from the high school a year or two, than to let her drift into a condition of nervous invalidism, that may become chronic.

Without a good physical basis, mental growth is apt to be impeded. How does your daughter dress? is a question I would ask the mother whose young daughter gives signs of fragility. Has she plenty of room to breathe? A young girl does not need and should not wear any article of dress that cramps her and interferes with the free circulation of the blood in her veins. Tight shoes and high heels have caused many a nervous headache. Some girls are not clothed warmly enough; others need glasses, they suffer from eye-strain that an oculist could relieve. No girl should be permitted to study hour after hour at home after school. Most of the school work should be done in the schoolroom, and several hours of fresh air and exercise should be a part of the young girl's daily regimen.

It is very much better to withdraw a student from school entirely, than to suffer her to attend school at her discretion and remain absent whenever she chooses. This fosters a habit of irresponsibility, and is greatly to be dreaded in its effect on character. When the doctor is obeyed, let the cessation from school and from social amusements as well be thorough, and, if possible, interest your daughter in the simple duties of home, and send her often out of doors, until she gains color and flesh, and forgets the bondage of her nerves.

Fox Terrier Versus Bull

A savage bull was prevented the other day from killing a young girl who had already been tossed by him, through the fearless courage of her little fox terrier. The little creature rushed at the bull, seized him by the ear, and refused to let go. The attention of the huge animal was diverted, and he turned to shake off his little enemy, when the girl, with a broken arm, clambered over a fence, and got out of his way; her pet hurriedly following her. The fearless courage of the little dog was a match for the brute anger of the infuriated bull. No wonder the little terrier was ever after worshiped by the girl whose life he saved. People who dislike dogs should at least give them credit for an instinct that is certainly akin to genius when their friends are attacked. A dog very rarely fails his friends in an emergency.



THE CHILDREN'S WINTER FUN

A merry circus in the snow
With clown and ring complete;
A giantess built from below
By Lilliputians sweet.
Such happy work the winter makes
For little hands and feet.

LITTLE MEN AND WOMEN

WHEN the sun has left the hill-top
And the daisy fringe is furled,
When the birds from wood and meadow
In their hidden nests are curled,
Then I think of all the babies
That are sleeping in the world.

There are babies in the highlands
And babies in the low,
There are pale ones wrapped in furry skins
On the margin of the snow,
And brown ones naked in the isles,
Where all the spices grow.

And some are in the palace
On a white and downy bed,
And some are in the garret
With a clout beneath their head,
And some are on the cold hard earth,
Whose mothers have no bread.

O little men and women,
Dear flowers yet unblown,
O little kings and beggars
Of the pageant yet unshown,
Sleep soft and dream pale dreams now,
To-morrow is your own. L. ALMA TADEMA.

The Other Side

[A friend has sent this very fair presentation of a subject that is interesting to many readers.]

I HAVE been reading much of late in criticism of the long-suffering landlord and hotel-keeper, as to their refusal to consider as applicants "families with children." Is there not a word to be said in their defence? Is there not "method in their madness?"

Having been brought up in an atmosphere of house and apartment letting, I am inclined to believe there is. My early home was in a large city, where my school years were passed, but all holidays and vacations were spent with my grandparents in a neighboring town. My grandfather was a real-estate owner, and was continually repairing tenements for reletting. I can well remember my childish delight when allowed to assist in the selection of wall-paper and "bordering," as it was then called, samples of which were sent from the shops for grandma's approval, as her taste in such matters (as in all others we thought—dear old grandma) was unquestionable.

In those days the "bordering" had to be cut and trimmed about the pattern before it could be applied, and as this made too much delay in the busy paperer's valuable time, grandma, two aunties, and my own dear mother, would sit down after breakfast, and instead of the usual sewing or reading, would all "cut bordering." How important and happy I was when a full roll of the pretty-colored border was given me to cut all by myself, and how proudly I would compare my work with that of the others, to my own entire satisfaction. The conversation at such times would naturally turn to the subject of repairs, the frequency and expense of which was deplored, because necessitated by the Browns' or the Smiths' lawless children, who had been allowed to run riot, tear off wall paper, dig into paint, and otherwise behave to the detriment of things in general.

Then, too, the garden space at the front and rear of the house, which grandfather had tried to make beautiful for the benefit of his tenants, would present a sorry appearance; bushes pulled up and flowers strewn about, apparently for the pure pleasure of destroying something.

Even as I write, a sad-faced young friend comes in to tell me of some repairs she is obliged to make on her house (and which she can ill afford), because the family to whom she rented it had children who were little vandals. Not long since, my friend lost a husband who was her constant companion and friend. This house had been their happy home. It was discouraging enough to be obliged to leave it, and see it occupied by careless strangers.

I have in mind a demure little maid of two summers, whose home is in an apartment house in which I have an interest. No one objects to the presence of this sweet little lady (who was born in the house, which accounts for her presence in rooms not usually rented to "families with children") for her mamma, grandma, auntie and nurse have taught her to respect the rights of other people. I can see her now as she trotted about the place last summer fondly patting the flowers and putting her little nose down to catch their fragrance, not offering to pick one, though she well knew she was welcome to as many as she chose to ask for.

We blame the children; we blame the landlords and the hotel-keepers, when, after all, if we went to the root of the matter, should we not censure the parents? The time is at hand when they will not only see the desirability and importance, but also the actual necessity of looking after the manners of their children, for not all fathers and mothers of large families are owners of fat pocketbooks. If they cannot buy or build houses of their own, they must occupy those owned by other people, the renting of which means in many cases their only income, and to whom every dollar expended for needless repairs is just one more forfeiture of a needed and reasonable comfort. A small corner of my grandfather's mantle has fallen on my own shoulders, and at present I am in sympathy with the much abused landlords who do not rent rooms to "families with children."

CARRIE ALLEN REED.

HOW TO REACH THE MASSES

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

IT is April 8, 1904, and a Sunday School pilgrim reaches the plain of Bethsaida in a little boat, such a boat, probably, as that in which the Lord Jesus reached the same spot in April, A.D. 29, eighteen hundred and seventy-five years before. The pilgrim looks about; the harp-shaped sea is the same as then; the everlasting hills are the same. There is Mt. Hermon, with its snow crown in the background; on the left the steep slopes of Gadara; on the right, the double-peaked Kum Hattin, Mount of Beatitudes. One city is in sight that was a part of the landscape in the time of Christ, Tiberias. It is on the right shore, about half way down the lake, close to the water's edge. The pilgrim looks for Capernaum; it is nowhere to be seen; a few fragments of stone are pointed out as marking the probable site. Magdala, too, has disappeared. The plain of Gennesaret is in sight on the right, where so many sick were brought to Jesus that their healing allowed him time neither to eat nor to sleep.

But our interest centres in the plain of Bethsaida, still grassy as on that day when Jesus fed the multitude of "five thousand men, beside women and children." By imagination the place is repeopled. It is the evening hour, and the sun is about going down. The people are seated on the grass in companies of fifty and a hundred. Their bright and many colored garments make the scene like a vast flower garden. The people have dropped into positions that show great weariness, for they came hither in the early morning, and have been all day without rest and refreshment, so eagerly have they listened to the teachings of Jesus, and watched the cures he has performed on all sides. But their faces have an expectant look. They see that Jesus will give them food to eat before they return to their homes, which many of them will not reach until far into the night. They hear his call to grace before meat, and bow their heads. They see his wonderful hands break the bread and give it to his twelve apostles to bring to them.

They marvel where so much bread could have been found in a country place, so far removed from any base of supply. But quickly the word is passed around that Jesus is performing a miracle to feed them; that only five loaves and two small fishes were the stock in hand, secured from a boy who had stopped along the way, on his errand to bring food to his home. The busy twelve apostles, almoners of Jesus' bounty, seem to come in view as they pass among the people.

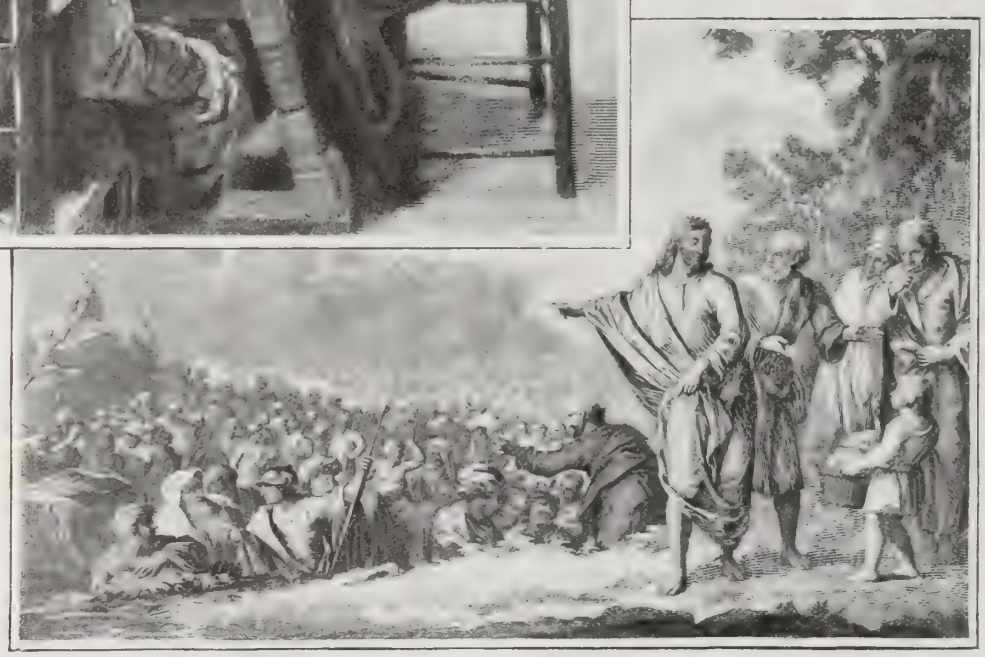
In front of the whole multitude, we seem to see the Lord Jesus himself, a long garment reaching down to his feet, and over it a white garment with blue borders and fringes, and on his head the large handkerchief worn as a turban, and partly hanging down over his shoulders. Kindliness is beaming from his gentle face, until it seems almost to be transfigured. At his side, a little in the background, is the boy with his empty basket, his face full of wonderment.

And now the scene is changed: the people have gone; only twelve men are left upon the plain besides the Lord Jesus. They have gathered up a basketful each of the fragments left over, for the people had enough and to spare.

TEACHING POINTS

1. Every meal is a miracle.
2. Every boy can help Christ.
3. We can "reach the masses," by bringing our small talents and inadequate means.
4. Christian work should be done in an orderly way (Mark 6:39).
5. Waste is wicked—"Gather up the fragments."
6. Christ himself is the bread we must distribute to the world's hungry multitude.
7. We should not merely taste, but be "filled."

CHRIST IN THE HOME (From a famous German painting)



"THERE IS A LAD HERE WHO HATH FIVE BARLEY LOAVES AND TWO SMALL FISHES"

ILLUSTRATION AND APPLICATION

1. The Christian's Right to Rest. Come apart and rest awhile (Mark 6:31). It is not only our right and privilege, but our duty to take needed rest and recreation. But, except in sickness, rest need not be idleness, which is often very tiresome to ourselves and to our fellows. Unless one is lazy, loafing is labor. So much sleep and so much waking rest as will keep body and mind in tune, is a Christian duty. Children may be amused, but men should seek recreation, not mere amusement. If this were kept in mind it would solve many needless debates as to what amusements are permissible for Christians. No "amusement" that is not also a needed recreation, has any right in any earnest life. Labor, which is not a "curse," except to those who make it so by the sins of selfishness and laziness, should delight a true man, like athletics, in which there is even greater effort, the difference being only in the attitude of mind. Booker Washington has said: "At Hampton, I not only learned that it was not a disgrace to labor but learned to love labor, not alone for its financial value, but for labor's own sake, and for the independence and self-reliance which the ability to do something which the world wants brings." Let us rejoice in having the privilege of Adam to delve the soil, or of Christ to drive the saw, and so find delight in work, but with equally clear consciences let us enjoy recreation whenever needed.

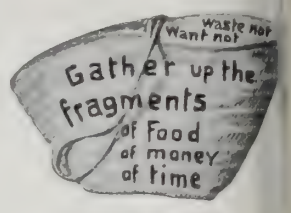
2. Sympathy for Souls. Jesus had compassion on them because they were as sheep having no shepherd. It was not that they were without gold, but without God, and so without hope. Here it is appropriate to quote the profound saying: "The lack of goods for the higher wants is not so sad as the lack of wants for the higher goods." How superficial is much of our pity, and consequently much of our charity! To the God's-eye view, the slums, with their half-fed people, are not so sad as the avenues, where souls drowned in a surfeit of selfishness, know not that they are "poor and miserable and blind and naked" (Rev. 3: 17). "How can we reach the masses?" we ask over and over in our conventio Well, nothing will help us so much in reaching them c by one as sympathy.

A lady friend visited a woman who lived in direst p erty, to invite her to a religious service. This frie knew the sad circumstances of the home she entered, and endeavored to bring some word of comfort and cheer. She finally said: "I have come to ask you to attend our service at the chapel to-night. I want you to come." "Why do you want me? No one cares about me," came the answer. The lady replied: "I care for you. You do not know it, but yeste day I thought of you and prayed for you." The tea came to the poor woman's eyes as she said: "Then life worth living if one cares for me. I did not think anyon in this world ever thought of me."



ORIENTAL BASKET

3. Gifts Used and Multiplied. Give ye them to ea Only a lad and a few loaves and fishes and twelve doubt ing apostles to provide for a hungry multitude! Nay you must count in Christ. When we "bring" to him i consecration our loaves and lads and our own doubtin selves, "our weakness is completeness in another's greate strength." We cry again and again: "We are not able' (Num. 13: 31; Neh. 4: 10); but the Bible answers ove and over: "He is able."

4. Every Meal a Miracle. When he had given thank he broke the loaves. How can anyone take a mouthful o bread without eucharistic awe at the daily miracle it pro claims! The whole universe has been enlisted to "pre pare a table before us." The sun drew waters from the earth, and in water-carts of cloud sent them from afar to water a divine seed, which he fed also from the transformed rocks of the earth, and fostered by the care of man developed by centuries of experience, who, after months of cultivation, passed it on to others, prepared to grind and bake it into tasty food for bone and flesh and brain. The plainest meal is a profound miracle. Let the poor put in their list of "compensations" the significant proverb, "plain living" and "high thinking," and let the "high thinking" include daily thanks to God on high, that he has "visited his people in giving them bread." Some writer has noted that "there is no food placed on the table of the rich which differs in any way from the plain food of the poor, except in its excess of carbons or fats; and these rich foods are the direct cause of headaches, gout, neuralgia, inflammation of the joints, and sores, pimples, abscesses, tumors and bad livers."

Therefore the evening meal of Riley's "Cheerful Little Cripple," described in lines below, is as nutritious as the rich man's feast:

At evening, when the ironin's done, an' Aunty's fixed the fire,
An' filled an' lit the lamp, an' trimmed the wick an' turned it higher,
An' fetched the wood all in fer night, an' locked the kitchen door,
An' stuffed the ole crack where the wind blows in up through the floor—
She sets the kittle on the coals, an' biles an' makes the tea,
An' fries the liver an' the mush, an' cooks an egg fer me;
An sometimes—when I cough so hard—her elderberry wine
Don't go so bad fer little boys with curv'ture of the spine.

Valuable Additions to Library

On my walls hang three beautiful Calendars and pictures. On my Bible stand is a thumb index, self-pronouncing Bible, Revised Version. In my bookcase are, From Manger to Throne, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; Heaven, Home and Happiness; Crown Dictionary; Every-Day Life in Washington; The Speaking Oak, and now comes Good Manners for All Occasions. I prize these books as very valuable additions to my library.

Talmage Sermon Treasury

Twenty Large-Print Volumes, Aggregating 8,500 Pages, Bound in Cloth and Gold, Containing over 500 of Dr. Talmage's Choicest Discourses--No Preacher's Library Complete Without this Great Work

REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D., stood before the Christian world for upwards of forty years, as one of the most eloquent exponents of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Never before, since the days of Peter and Paul, had it been given to any one man to preach through pulpit or press to such vast audiences as he has been privileged to address.

Dr. Talmage's sermons are marvels of vivid imagery and superb word painting, rich beyond comparison in anecdote and incident, unsurpassed for originality, versatility, terseness and splendor of diction, and notable for their close fidelity to the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour as laid down in the New Testament. They constitute a vast mine of information, covering nearly every phase of national and religious life and thought, and are generally admitted to be the best known models of popular presentation of religious truth.

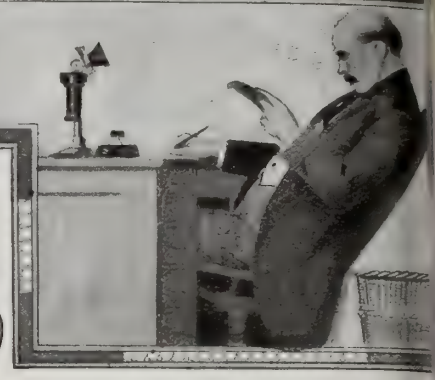
THE HEART OF THE WORLD



By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF OPENING CHAPTERS

Rev. Fredrick Stanton, D.D., of the aristocratic St. Cecilia Metropolitan Church, is a pastor with broad humanitarian views of life. He has found time amid the duties of his ministry to write a book, entitled, The Christian Socialist, which has just been published under the nom de plume of "Mark Burns." It excites a tremendous sensation. His secret of the authorship is known only to Miss Mildred Rodney, his betrothed, who has divined it. The book excites mingled praise and antagonism, and is the topic of the hour. The conservative element denounce it as dangerous to society. Judge Rodney is especially bitter. Next winter, the Rev. Fredrick Stanton is chosen as bishop. A distinguished audience assembles in St. Cecilia's, to witness the consecration. At the critical moment, the pastor makes an open avowal of the authorship of the offending book. Bishops, clerics, and audience are stricken dumb with amazement. His ecclesiastical career is regarded as ended. Miss Rodney, notwithstanding some parental opposition, consents to marry Stanton, and the two begin to face the world together bravely.

Meanwhile, a great strike is going on at Lenox, and Stanton is invited to address the Union men, by Bruce Harvey, their president. He advocates Christian love and forbearance, instead of violence, but the meeting is stampeded by the news of a riot at the mills. Stanton and Harvey go there with the crowd, but cannot preserve order. In the riot several are killed and many injured. Stanton rescues a poor negro worker from the furious mob, but is himself badly hurt in doing so. He and Harvey become fast friends. Harwood, and Wrightam are two millionaire mill-owners, whose hard and oppressive measures have embittered the workers. Stanton resolves to plead with them for a better understanding, as both are church members and professing Christians. He calls on Wrightam, but meets with a decided rebuff. With Harwood he has more success, and the two become good friends. Harwood has a great domestic sorrow, which takes the sweetness out of all his business triumphs. He leaves his wealthy home and friends, and disguised, goes to work as a mill-hand.

Stanton meanwhile is becoming well known as an advocate of Christian Socialism, and is a frequent lecturer. He meets many queer characters among the workers, and much appreciation. The troubles at Lenox continue, and he arrives there one day just in time to find a mob about to burn a negro who is accused of murder. Stanton determines to thwart the lynchers, but is knocked senseless, and the negro is burned. Next day the real culprits are found, and the negro victim is shown to have been wholly innocent. There is a popular revulsion of feeling in favor of Stanton. On the following Sunday he preaches in one of the leading pulpits, by invitation, and takes the lynching for his topic. Some people in the audience take exception to certain remarks by the speaker, as unpatriotic, and there is a momentary interruption, during which many leave the hall. Stanton then quietly concludes his discourse. While visiting the Company's mill, Stanton witnesses a heroic act by a worker, who saves Harvey's life by imperiling his own. He recognizes the worker as Harwood. Harwood dies of his injuries, and Harvey, an hour later, learns the true story of his heroic rescue. Harvey, on recovering, seeks Stanton's society and counsel, and is apparently deeply interested in religion. His interest, however, is wholly superficial. He soon resents Stanton's influence with the workers, and demands that Stanton's evangelistic labors among them should cease. On Stanton's refusal to comply, Harvey, in a passion, strikes his friend. The latter accepts the assault in silence, forbearing to retaliate. Soon afterward, the two are reconciled.

Stanton's preaching at Saint Cecilia, where he is laboring by special invitation, touches Wrightam's conscience. He sends a messenger for Stanton, who finds the usually hard hearted moneymaker under deep conviction. Mrs. Wrightam declares her astonishment and incredulity at the change. Her husband, however, boldly announces his new spiritual allegiance, and tells his wife of his intention to conduct his business hereafter on Christian principles. A stormy scene follows.

"I WOULD die for Him with joy," continued Wrightam, "I will do what He tells me to. His commands are first. My duty to you is plain. You are my wife, and by the sacred law of our union now, even though we committed sin to be husband and wife, I am bound to provide, to protect, to care for you. All that a man can do towards that I am ready to do in every honest way. But I will not, and cannot deceive you, Amy, I cannot, as a disciple of Christ, continue to make money or maintain a social position at the expense of my conscience. I will no longer be a party, silent or otherwise, to the unchristian practices of which I have been guilty in the commercial world. Rather than do that, I will go to work myself in the mills, as Harwood did, as an honest laborer at a dollar and a-half a day. How else shall I become a witness for my Saviour? In what other way can I prove to the world the truth of my new life?"

She listened with eyes that contracted with impotent anger. She drew herself up, and the jewels flashed on her arms and about her throat. There was a beautiful wristlet of opals that Wrightam had given her when they were married. She raised her arm and deliberately unclasped this circle of gems, and in her madness threw it with all her might on the floor. The opals broke from their delicate gold settings, and rolled over the polished surface. One of them fell near her foot. She set her heel upon it. The soul of the woman was towering up with satanic fury.

"I will go my own ways! I give you warning, J. B. Wrightam! You cannot impose such a life on me! You are not my lord and master! I renounce any such union with any such fanaticism. I refuse to ruin my happiness by any such madness!"

COPYRIGHT, 1905, BY CHARLES M. SHELDON.

For a moment Wrightam faced her, white-lipped but calm; sorrow, pity, anguish, suffering, tugging at his heart. She then turned away and walked out of the room. When she was gone, he stood still for a minute. Then he walked over to the window-seat. He sat down and buried his head in his hands. Tears rolled over his face, but from his lips softly there came the words of the old Gospel hymn: "If ever I loved Thee, my Jesus, 'tis now."

The night passed on, and he remained in the room until daybreak. It seemed to him that, in a very peculiar sense, the room had been consecrated by the wonderful experience he had known there. In that room, with his business friends, many times during the past years he had worked out those bold, shrewd schemes which had given him the name of a great captain of industry. The very walls had been witnesses to commercial fraud on such a stupendous scale that the general public could not dream of their extent and character. But henceforth this "den" would always remind him of his first meeting with his real Lord, Jesus Christ, the Master of earth and the hope of the world. Do you not think that when Paul returned to Jerusalem from Damascus, he remembered that spot in the highway where Jesus spoke to him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" We can imagine the new-born apostle falling on his knees in the dust of the road, and with streaming eyes, returning thanks that the vision of eternal life was granted to his soul at that spot.

Even so, Wrightam, as he kept his vigil there, watching with his Lord, bearing the cross of his new relationship to his wife and family, was upborne by his vision of the Divine which the room had witnessed. It was holy ground to him, and would be historic to him henceforth.

Neither his wife, Alfred nor Eileen appeared at the breakfast-table. He ate his meal in silence, alone, and then went back into the "den."

He tore the slip off his desk calendar, as he had been in the habit of doing, but instead of throwing it into the basket, he folded it carefully, and put it in a small card-case. As he did so he noted that he had marked ahead on the calendar an important directors' meeting for that very date. It was the election of officers, and a very important meeting in many other ways.

It meant the organization of a new combination of Capital against Labor. As the largest shareholder in the mills and in the First Bank of Lenox, Wrightam was secure in his position as the head of the combine. The election of directors was a form, and had been for years past, with no other result anticipated except that of the giving to Wrightam supreme control over the business. Harwood's death had removed the only man who had at any time rivaled Wrightam as a trust leader. If a single individual ever could be said to own a town, that could be said of J. B. Wrightam, in regard to Lenox. He had been, up to this morning, its financial autocrat, dictating its largest industry, shaping its financial policy, and reaping the overwhelming financial gain for himself.

As he prepared to go down to this meeting, his mind, clear, and to his own great satisfaction, calm and even joyful, called into view the different members of the Board of Directors of the mills and the bank.

There was Commings, the Vice-President, shrewd, cold, a polished man of the world, a member of Saint Cecilia, and one of the bitter opponents of Stanton and his ideas.

There was Rollins, a local merchant, proprietor of a great department store, long-headed, with energy and push, always adding some new feature to his business.

There was Judge Rodney, able and convincing, a lawyer of great repute and the best-read man in Lenox.

There was Fleming, a capitalist, who had made his money in selling South African war supplies, who owned the most expensive house in Lenox, and whose wife was a personal friend of Mrs. Wrightam.

There was Collins, another capitalist, who had been Wrightam's lieutenant or go-between in the various deals which the magnate had brought to a successful finish for himself.

There was Durand, a silent, uncommunicative man, who, it was said, had made a fortune by manipulating copper-ore stocks and railroad shares.

As he thought over the personality of these mon makers, Wrightam could not think of one of th with the exception of Judge Rodney, who would pr ably understand his change of attitude in regard to nancial matters. To most of these men, it was meat and drink of their existence to make money, the first business of their lives. To make it in a way that would not land them in jail was consider by them to be legitimate. Even if in the doing of t other men were ruined, even if no actual service w rendered society, even if the profits that came to th were possible on account of watering the stock and c ceiving the public by representations of fictitious valu that never had any existence except on paper, even th these men, almost to an individual, were absorbed the mad chase for wealth.

Was not J. B. Wrightam their great example? W it not the ambition of every young man in Lenox reach J. B. Wrightam's pedestal as a captain of indu try? Had not one of the leading magazines printed spirited biography of J. B. Wrightam only a few wee ago, and pointed him out to the youth of the land an example of what could be done by shrewdness, a tention to details, and a rare combination of coolne mental alertness and dogged persistence? Wrighta had at the time, with almost childlike egotism, boug a large number of these magazines, marked the artic and sent it to his business acquaintances. He had c out the magazine's picture of himself and hung it at his desk at the bank.

When Wrightam entered the directors' room at t bank it was eight minutes to ten. The board was punctual body, and although none of the members h yet come in, Wrightam knew that before the ho struck they would nearly all be seated about the lon polished table. He passed through into his own pr vate office and shut the door, sat down at his desk a put his head down on it, praying for strength a peace. The wonder of his new life had not diminis ed. If anything, the exaltation of his religious sen of relation to Christ was deeper than it had been t day before; and, in addition to that, he felt an in crease of joy, a vivid, but calm, assurance of divi companionship and support.

He opened his door and went out into the director room, taking his place at the head of the table, usual. It was one minute of the hour and all the d rectors were present but Durand. As the clock struc he entered quietly, and with a slight smile, as if com plimenting himself on the fact that he had not lost an valuable time, and had saved the five-dollar fine fo being late, he took his seat.

Wrightam got up as soon as the hour had struc His look around the table was significant. Not a ma there failed to notice something unusual.

"We are met, gentlemen, for the annual election o officers, and the transaction of other important busi ness. Before anything else is done, however, I as you to listen to a personal statement I must make."

Every face around that long, polished table stared a the President of the First Bank of Lenox with a deep ening interest that grew in intensity with every second Wrightam leaned over a little and placed one large heavy hand on the table. His face was the calmest in the room as he went on.

"This is the first occasion I have had to make a pub lic confession of an experience I have no right to keep to myself. Yesterday, to be exact, last night, I had religious experience which has changed the course o my entire life. I have become a Christian disciple and I want you all to know the fact, as it will have th most important and practical bearing on my actio here to-day."

He paused, and the men around that table continue to stare at him in speechless amazement. The an nouncement made by Wrightam was so simple, yet s astounding, that there was no effort made by any on to speak. Again he looked into the faces of his asso ciates.

"Of course, you all know I have been a member of church all these years and have passed for a Christian man. In reality I was never a Christian, only in name It meant nothing to me as a force or a life. To-day see all this as a new man. Christianity has come t mean to me the greatest and most beautiful thing i the world. I have been a money worshiper. I have never given the Kingdom of God a worthy thought. All that is completely changed. I say this to you, because I believe it is the first necessary act of my Christian life, confession after belief."

The silence around the table had deepened. It was absolute. If the great magnate had opened the meeting by saying that the First Bank of Lenox had suspended payment and closed its doors, there could not have been greater bewilderment.

"Gentlemen, you are all well enough informed to know, that I cannot, under these conditions that now confront me, continue to do business on the basis we have been accustomed to. The representations by which we obtained control of the plant at Oreville, for example, are, from a Christian point of view, absolutely dishonest. You will allow me to say that it is only a matter of a few months, at the longest, before the public will be in possession of these facts, and there may be a popular uprising against us. But that is not all. It is only one item out of all the rest. The business of the mills, as it has been carried on, has involved so much that is unjust and unchristian, that it will be a moral impossibility for me to have a personal share in it unless the methods are radically changed. I am not so blind to the facts as to suppose the public can be kept in the dark concerning these matters much longer. But even if I knew that our methods could be continued unrebuked indefinitely, under the present rule of conduct which governs me, I could not endorse such methods nor continue to practice them. It has come to the parting of the ways with me, brothers." It was the first time in his life that Wrightam had ever called these money-makers by that term. Now, as he looked into their astonished faces, there surged into his heart a wave of feeling for them such as Paul had when he said, "Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel." The amazing depth, reality and joy of his conversion could not have been proved more clearly than by what now happened. "Brothers," he repeated the word, "I stand here before you to-day a saved man. I gladly acknowledge Jesus Christ as my Saviour. I am ready to follow him. Would to God all of you might know with me the divine joy of this new life. Oh, my brothers, what wonderful things we might do for the Kingdom of God on earth, if once we were inspired with the love of God and our brother men! What miracles of redemption of the business of the world we might behold, if once we were eager to do the Christlike thing in the money-making energy of our lives. God be merciful to me! I count myself the chief of sinners. But God has snatched my soul out of the pit and redeemed me with a wonderful redemption, and I am not able to hold my testimony from you. I say here calmly, but without any reservation, that from this time forth, I shall, by the help of God, obey his commandments as I believe they ought to be obeyed in the money-making world, and that means farewell to the methods I have all my life practiced. I would count it, not to the unparalleled joy of my own experience, the greatest happiness of my life, if you would all walk with me along this highway of service."

In the history of revival movements, it has been true that very many souls of the redeemed have stood up and witnessed before the Church in public to the grace of a saving power. But it is doubtful if any man ever chose a better place to witness for his Lord, than Wightam chose when he stood at the end of that table in the directors' room of the First Bank of Lenox, and told these six men the facts about his discipleship.

Durand was the first one to break the long silence that followed. Wrightam had taken his seat, and in the emotion following his confession, he had bowed his head upon his hands.

"Gentlemen, Brother Wrightam has mistaken the place. This is not the Rink, and one of Stanton's Gospel services, but, as I understand it, a called meeting of the directors of the First Bank of Lenox. I should like to be corrected if I am misinformed."

There was another painful pause. Commings, the Vice-President, was tracing meaningless figures on the letter-head bank paper in front of him. He rose in his place nervously.

"I—we—perhaps we had better adjourn this morning to some other date—until—until—we—until Mr. Wrightam——"

"I move we adjourn to meet at the call of the Vice-President," said Commings hurriedly. "All in favor of adjournment say aye, all opposed no, it is a vote." Everybody rose except Wrightam, who remained seated. The most awkward pause of all followed, and then without a word every one went out except Commings and Judge Rodney.

As the door shut, Commings savagely struck the table with his open hand.

"Mr. Wrightam, this is a most astonishing thing you have done. Do you begin to realize what a crisis you have precipitated into our plans? Do you, for one moment, understand what all this will mean to us, to me, to the bank, to the mills, to our schemes in general?"

Wrightam raised his head.

"I understand, Commings, something of what it means. I don't deny it is a serious matter for all of us. So far as I can receive the brunt of the trouble that will flow out of my action I am eager to take it. If my withdrawal from the company under its present management is likely to cause you or other members loss, I stand ready to give up all I possess to save you. I do not——"

"Do you mean," Commings spoke with a great effort to control his excitement, "Do you mean——"

"I mean, Commings, that if my action hereafter should involve you, for example, in such a way as to cause you financial loss, I will gladly turn over to you and the rest every cent I have in the world, rather than have you suspect me of any other motive than the one I have here to-day acknowledged as the one greatest motive of all my life."

"But your withdrawal from the bank and the mills will create a panic." Judge Rodney spoke. His face was very grave. He had listened to Wrightam's words with eyes fixed on him, the only man at the table who really understood, in some degree, what it all meant.

"I WILL GO MY OWN WAYS," SHE SAID.
"YOU ARE NOT MY LORD AND MASTER"

"It may be," Wrightam said slowly. "Still, what can I do? I have wronged the public by my wicked acts. To set those acts right, to restore justice to its place may, for a brief space, cause trouble to others. To help lessen such trouble I am ready, as I have said, to sacrifice my entire fortune. Money! What is that to me now by the side of right! I am not, of course, ignorant of the fact that in all probability what I do now will precipitate some kind of a crisis in the business. It will involve the men who, with me, have all their years been precipitating crises of another kind among other men. The only difference is that heretofore the other men have lost and we have won. If we lose now, it will be no more than we have inflicted on the public. I do not see any other course open to me."

"It will mean much, I tell you, Wrightam!" Commings seemed beside himself. He spoke with great agitation. "The minute this news is out on the street, no man can tell what the result will be. The Oreville matter was a secret. What right had you to disclose that? What right, I say——"

The Vice-President was so near forgetting his usual polished, dignified demeanor, that Judge Rodney interfered.

"This talk can do no good, Mr. Commings. Plainly, I want to say, Mr. Wrightam's statement about the Oreville purchase is news to me. I certainly do not approve of it if I understand him. As to other transactions of the Board of Directors in matters concerning the bank and the mill, I call you both to witness, gentlemen, I have more than once registered my protest against certain measures passed by the Board and, you will pardon me, Wrightam, I have always been overruled and voted down by your own approval of doubtful financial actions."

"I acknowledge it, Brother Rodney," Wrightam said sorrowfully. "It's a part of my past that I am now eager to atone for. If you will show me how I can do it any other way, I wish you would tell me."

"Any other way!" Commings struck his hand again on the table. "Any other way. What more could a man do to deliberately ruin his associates than you have done here to-day? The mere rumor that you are to withdraw from the company will precipitate a slump of prices on Oreville and Lenox mill stock. Right on the event of Harvey's move to withdraw the Unions and organize a co-operative stock company with mills of their own, the result of this morning's unexampled fanaticism will simply mean the biggest panic Lenox has ever known. It will mean ruin; ruin, I tell you. And I, for one, am not prepared to stand it. Do you hear me?"

"I hear you," Wrightam announced calmly, "What would you have me do?"

"Do? Call the directors back before the news gets out. Tell them you have been laboring under religious excitement, and have been indiscreet in your language. Have the business we were planning go on as usual. Save ourselves from the inevitable ruin that faces us."

"Do you mean, Mr. Commings, that you counsel me to retract all I have said about my conversion, and assent, as heretofore, to all methods I now regard as wrong?"

"You do not need to retract all you said. Assure the Board of your assistance in the plans we must make. At least keep silent or remain with the company until we have dealt with the Unions."

"And sanction the godless measures we have established? Do you advise me to do that?"

"Godless! It is simply business, as business is conducted. You cannot inject the Golden Rule into business. It is a conflict. It has been established by common consent. You have been its best exponent. I say your withdrawal now and condemnation of our plans means ruin to us. It means ruin."

"It has meant ruin to us all our lives, Commings. Ruin of all the sacred, loving feelings of man for man. Ruin of all the religious aspirations, ruin of the holiest ambitions, and ruin of the dearest things of the soul. The loss of money is the smallest thing that threatens us. It is no longer my god. I cannot, and will not support by silence nor by consent, the iniquity of the methods I have in the past endorsed and worked out. If my act means your financial loss, I believe, on the other hand, it will mean by the grace of God unspeakable gain to the commercial world at large."

Commings was about to reply to Wrightam when Judge Rodney gravely interrupted. All three men were under great and unusual excitement, but Wrightam, was by far the calmest of the three.

"Do you consider your mind clear on this religious question, Mr. Wrightam? Do you consider the experience as in every way worthy of intellectual, mental assent. Is it safe to follow the excitement, the emotional stress under which you are laboring?"

Wrightam clenched his hands. His face grew red a moment, but when he answered Judge Rodney, it was with a quiet, sane, well-balanced reply that staggered the lawyer and effectually silenced him.

"Judge Rodney, my religious experience is the sanest, truest thing in my whole life. I don't deny the emotion. I have felt more within the last twenty-four hours than during all the years since I was born. But is emotion not to be trusted? May it not be as trustworthy a witness as the will or the intellect? I claim here and now, that I am acting in a saner manner than any member of the Board of Directors of this bank. They think, as I did once, that the first business of a man's life is to make money. All the teaching of Jesus Christ the Son of God is contrary to that idea. The Kingdom of God ought to be the first of all objects in a sane man's life. I believe that now. And I claim that in believing with the greatest and best Being that ever lived, I am living in a truer, calmer, more rightly-balanced intellectual and mental condition than the man who denies that Jesus Christ taught the only way to live."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Mrs. E. S. K., Caro, Mich. Is it right to make fairs for the benefit or support of the church? It makes me think of the passage in the Bible Matt. 21: 12, where Jesus went into the Temple and cleansed it.

We have repeatedly stated in THE MAIL-BAG, that the church itself is not the place for fairs and secular entertainments. If held at all, they should be held elsewhere; but the church which supplies all its needs voluntarily and without resorting to such means, is in a better way for real spiritual service than a church which devotes itself to worldly ways of securing the means to carry on the Lord's work.

A. W. L., Cohoes, N. Y. What are the qualifications, especially the property qualifications, of an immigrant, in order to be admitted to the United States?

All immigrants are examined by the United States Immigration Inspectors, and each case is carefully considered. No person with a contagious disease, a criminal record, who shows any likelihood of becoming a public charge, or is under contract to work in this country, or believes in the destruction of all government (anarchy), will be allowed to land. There is no property qualification, but the immigrant must show that he has enough money for his support until he obtains work. The government has the authority to return any immigrant within two years after his arrival, if he has proved undesirable.

C. W. H., Newark, N. J. 1. Are the Epistles of Pliny, the younger, now in existence, and of what did they treat? 2. Who were the serfs in Russia emancipated by Alexander II. in 1861, and how did they become serfs? 3. What is the origin and significance of a broom at the mast-head?

1. Yes; They are in existence. They are, for the most part, letters written by Pliny to the Roman Emperor Trajan. They give an accurate idea of the condition of Roman provincial government at that time, and also of the customs of the early Christians and their treatment by the Roman authorities. Consult "Pliny's Letters" in Collins' Ancient Classics for English Readers. 2. The serfs in Russia were the peasantry, who were attached to the soil, and they could either be sold with the land or without it, according to the pleasure of the proprietor. Their condition was not far removed from actual slavery. The peasants were practically free until the sixteenth century. During the reign of Peter the Great they were permanently attached to the soil. 3. A broom at the mast of a ship indicated that the vessel was for sale. Tromp, a Dutch admiral of the seventeenth century, sailed up the Thames, with brooms on the masts, to indicate that he "would sweep the English from the sea." 4. We cannot answer your last question.

C. F. R., Hagaman, N. Y. What is the estimated cost per day to the Russian Government, of maintaining its army in the present war, including horses, ammunition, medicines, etc? Does it cost the Japanese Government as much as the Russian?

Any estimate that could be given would be mere guesswork, as only the governments concerned really know how many men are under arms. The military expenditures will probably be held secret even after the conclusion of the present war.

W. S. B., Flat Lick, La. What is the meaning of Mignon?

Mignon is the French word for darling. It is also the name of the heroine in Goethe's famous novel of Wilhelm Meister.

J. D., Sabougla, Miss. What is the prevailing religion in Chile and Argentina?

Roman Catholic in both countries. The government of Chile supports the Roman Church, and the public exercise of any other religion is prohibited by the constitution, though in reality this is not enforced. There are few Protestants in the country. In Argentina, the Catholic religion is supported by the church, but other sects are guaranteed religious freedom, and Protestant worship is not hindered. Of nearly four million people, twenty-seven thousand are Protestant.

Reader, Elburn, Ill. Will you kindly give a short biography of Mrs Charlotte Perkins Gilman?

Born in Hartford, Conn., 1860; daughter of Frederick Beecher, and granddaughter of Lyman Beecher; began public work, 1890; married to G. H. Gilman, 1900. Mrs. Gilman was formerly Mrs. Stetson, and became widely known as a writer and lecturer on ethics, economics and sociology. Among her books are, Women and Economics, In This Our World (verse), The Yellow Wall Paper, Concerning Children.

Anxious Mother, Ridgeway, O. At what age and how would you begin the teaching of Jesus to children? Is it not the best way to reach them, to serve him through love and not fear? I have three bright, happy children and I would rather they be true Christians than anything else in this world, and I am so afraid I may not lead them the right way.

We believe a child should be taught about God and heaven as soon as its little mind can understand. The love and care of the Heavenly Father and the wondrous story of the Babe of Bethlehem can be grasped even by the mind of a child. Bible stories are a mine of interest to the young. Prayer, perfect trust, the love of God and of the gentle Jesus, and love and kindness to all around, may be early and ineffaceably impressed upon the mind.

G. W. B., Pickens, W.Va. 1. When was the Sunday School established? 2. Give statistics of membership?

1. Although there had been instruction in the catechism during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in England, the first Sunday School, as we know it, was established in 1780, in the city of Gloucester, by Robert Raikes, a printer. 2. The total number of teachers and scholars in the world, according to the report of the Tenth International Sunday School Convention, was 25,616,771. This does not include schools of the Roman Catholic and non-evangelical Protestant churches.

The Crown Dictionary has arrived in first-class condition. This is a veritable storehouse of facts upon all subjects. Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, another, is just the book for restful, spare moments. The little gem of art, the drop-leaf Calendar, surpasses any calendar I have seen this year—beautiful in appearance and in spirit. MELVINA K. RAY.

J. H. D., Traverse City, Mich., E. J. Moore, Fresno, Cal., and others. Was the wine Christ made at the wedding at Cana fermented or intoxicating wine?

There is no evidence in the narrative on which to base an opinion, but the inferences are all against its being intoxicating w
It could not have been fermented in understanding of the word, nor can imagine our Lord deliberately making that would intoxicate. There were var kinds of non-intoxicating wines in us the time, and it is natural to suppose it would be a wine of that kind that C made.

M. B. M., Gardner, Kan. 1. Who invented phonograph, and by what principle is s reproduced by it? 2. What is the ave temperature, during July and August, Phœnix, Ariz.

The first device for the reproductio sound was invented by Leon Scott, and called the autograph. In 1877, Thomas Edison invented the phonograph, us many of the principles discovered by Sc Sound entering the horn of the phonogr strikes a diaphragm beneath which is a ting stylus, or point. The vibration of the phragm causes this point to cut into a rev ing wax cylinder. To reproduce sound, a stylus with a round end is s stituted, and this, on the machine be started, follows the lines cut in recording wax, and causes the phragm to vibrate, producing original sound. 2. According to the Jewish recor Joazar held the high-priesthood fr B. C. 4 to A. D. 4, or seven yea and was succeeded in A. D. 4 Eleazar.

F. C. C., Kalamazoo, Michiga writes:

I note the condition of the poor of N York, and will tell you of a similar case a how it was handled. A certain city in nor ern Michigan, some years ago was in h circumstances. A hard winter was comi on and a great many workmen were thro out of employment by the shut-down of t mills and lumber camps. They were go honest citizens, but no work. The c fathers saw that something must be done carry them through the winter. There w a deep gulley running through the c and sand-hills within the city limits. Bo were practically useless and unsightly. Th gave the men one dollar per day, and m and team two dollars per day of eight ho work, to move the sand-hills into the g ley. The result was they accomplished a go thing for the city, and made both pieces of land value and did not make paupers of their people.

GIVING OUT BED TICKETS TO THE HOMELESS AT MADISON SQUARE

ON cold, snowy, winter nights, a pitiful crowd of men stand in the shadow of the Worth Monument, Madison Square, New York. The cold grows more intense, but still the crowd of men keeps growing and remains silent, while they stamp and shuffle to keep themselves from freezing. Passers-by look curiously at the strange gathering. In that group are old men and young, some mere boys, and others trembling with age and weakness.

For fourteen years, twice a week, on cold winter nights, a big, broad-shouldered, kindly-faced man has come to the square, and, standing upon a box, has spoken to this forlorn-looking crowd of poor half-frozen wretches. Then he has offered up a prayer, simple and earnest, that the good Lord would provide the means not only to show these men the better life, but that they might have shelter that night. This man is Frederic Rotzler, who for fourteen years has stood at his strange post every Wednesday and Sunday night in winter, giving out tickets for cheap lodgings to any and all who ask. His work is not connected with any organization or association. It is a work of faith alone. The passers-by can contribute something if they choose, but the Chaplain of the Square never begs of any one. As fast as dimes, or quarters, or larger sums are contributed, he gives the men at the head of the group tickets that entitle them to fifteen cent beds in a lodging-house. If any man has a nickel, he gives him a ticket, and applies that nickel to the purchase of a ticket for the man who has no money. Some nights the chaplain has enough to put them all to bed, and at other times they have to scatter. This is one of the strangest and most characteristic contrasts of social conditions in the metropolis.

The New Evangelism

REV. C. H. YATMAN

THERE is much talk of "New Evangelism" nowadays. A little of it is good, not much – ten pounds of chaff to a pint of wheat. I think I have put in too much wheat; but never mind! All your psychic power will never save a soul. It may reform, but it will never re- d m men. Culture alone has no power to li a soul out of sin. One may as well t to sweeten cesspools with pearls. Ori- al orgies are not worse than American h icides. There is about as much sin to th square yard in Boston, and to the square mi in New England as anywhere on this e th. One divorce to every eight marriages o staid old Puritan soil! Think of that!

t may be that a Wesley or an Edwards c ld not move this generation. I confess I ould like to see it tried. Men of their ni e-up would move any age. It was not s much the kind of truth they used, but th way they used it, and the way it m ed them.

Hair hung over hell" might not be th theme of Edwards if he were here now, bu give us a man with his deep and abid- in convictions, his earnestness and inten- si , his prayer, power and boldness, his fe ings and fearlessness, and again you w see sinners penitent. What if Uni- tar an weeds did grow after Edwards' p ughing! You can set over against it m ch of the missionary harvest of the w ld. The Babe born in Bethlehem caused th death of many infants; but that did n keep him back. A Wesley in the Methodist Church now would move that b y to revival work, and consecration and h iness of the right kind that would startle a icked world. That Church needs noth- in so much now as a leader—bold, big, b ve, good—on fire for the souls of men. Ten millions are far wiser than the Anglican c rch of Wesley's day, and would not t n him out.

One grows sick at heart over the talk a ut revivals. What we need is one, wide a ur Republic—not talk about one. The Oxford Holy Club solved the new evangel- is of their day in a hurry. It is not new m thods we need so much as new men. Stand by, when the Scriptures take their r ghtful place again, we will discover that c nged character means changed condi- ti s. We have been trying to save men by l ves and fishes, science and Socrates, l wning and brotherhood, music and m thods, star preaching and preachers, a l by church buildings so fine that com- n folk are afraid of them. No wonder th machinery of the present day does not turn out a greater grist of saints from the raw material. The fact is, there is "no corn in the hopper." Sinners do not go to church in any great numbers. Ninety-five young men out of every hundred in America are unchurched. Wesley went out after converts. Pentecost was street preaching by a redeemed and consecrated backslider on fire, backed by a hundred and nineteen men and women of the same kind. They solved the new evangelism of their day. They solved it as we will have to solve it.

You can get a thousand people to sign a card without much trouble. I have tried it. It will take some of the old evangelism to get them to be New Testament Christians, with separation from the world, and sin given up, to the point of sacrifice and restitution.

The impeachment papers against the light theology and the light-weight parsons it produces, will begin with the charge that it brings forth no men of heavy calibre as evangels. I affirm that men will never be moved Godward in great masses for regeneration, in its fullest sense, by the mere presentation of love. Law is a factor so great in human life and government, that its basic principle affords a ground of appeal that cannot be left out if you reach effectively the will of man, and no man is converted whose will is not reached by the truth that sets him free.

Evolution has its place, but its place is not that of a Saviour of men. The crime of false theology, and some of the new evangelism is that they invert the order of God that says, "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, etc.," but we turn it upside down and say "know," then be virtuous, then believe. Men think they have become wiser than God! Repentance is relegated to the rear these days, or if dealt with at all it is dealt with as a theory, instead of a solid, essential and necessary fact. All sane Christian workers must know, if they stop to think, that the preaching of John the Baptist was never needed so much as now. Of what use is a revival that does not make its converts quit sin, restore ill-gotten gains, forgive enemies, give up habits and pleasures that cause multitudes of young and old to stumble? Of what use is a name in the church register, and vows taken so lightly that any secular call or desire leads folk to set them lightly aside? The Eleven Commandments should be hurled like bolts of fire at the Christless Christians and evil-doers.

Clergymen, very many of them, need to change and be changed. They need to be saved from their doubts and uncertainties in message and sermon—changed from formality to fervency; from fear of man to fear of God; from fruitlessness to fruitfulness, by sowing the Word of God instead of the word of man.

The New Evangelism, if it be Apostolic, will be appropriate and effective; if not, it won't.

Strange African Myths

CAPT. MERKER, a German officer who has spent some ten years in German Ist Africa says the London Standard, hs written a very interesting ethnographic monograph on the Masai natives, in vich he describes not only the manners ad customs of that race, but also their lguage and traditions. According to Cpt. Merker, the Masai have had handed own to them a story of the first creation o the world and the human race which bars a remarkable resemblance to that ontained in the Old Testament. The Masai relate that:

n the beginning the earth was a barren, dry esert, in which there lived a dragon. Then God ne down from heaven, fought against the drag- and vanquished it. There where God slew the ast and poured out its blood, there arose a Par- se luxuriant with the richest vegetation. [The ative word for this Paradise is "Kerio."] Then d created by his word sun, moon, stars, plants d animals, and last of all He made the first man couple to arise.

Hereupon follows a description of how God commanded the couple in question to stain from eating the fruit of a certain ee, and how on his one day paying a visit, was his custom, to Paradise, he found em guiltily trying to hide from him. It as the Serpent here, too, who was at fault, d the woman who had succumbed to its mptation to eat the fruit. The Serpent, cording to the Masai tradition, had three heads, and was punished by God for being commanded to live forever in the "holes of the earth."

The two human beings were then driven out of the Garden of Paradise by the "Morning Star," which was ordered to stand at the gate to keep it. Then the human race grew in number, and genealogies are recorded very similar to those in the Bible account, until the first murder was committed, when a flood was caused to appear. Instead of Noah, a good old man named Tumbainot was bidden build a "wooden chest" and betake himself into it with his belongings and animals of every kind. From the ark too, as in the Bible story, Tumbainot sent out a dove, but, besides the dove, he also dispatched a vulture to find out how the flood was looking. At the conclusion of the flood a fourfold rainbow appeared as proof of the cessation of God's ire.

Her Life Spent for Others

BY ARTHUR T. PIERSON

SOME people who die deserve more than a passing obituary notice, and among them we rank Miss Annie Macpherson, who died at Hove, Brighton, England, November 27, in her eightieth year. Her work ranks very high among the forms of benevolence.

It is always inspiring to observe how God trains his workers for special service. Miss Macpherson was born in Campsie, Scotland. Her father, a specialist in education, took care that she should be sent to the best schools. While yet a girl as his secretary in the Ockham Industrial Schools, she became familiar with the theory and practice of teaching, which proved of inestimable value in her subsequent life-work.

Further preparation awaited her, when, in Cambridgeshire, her heart was drawn out by the neglected condition of some hundreds of workmen there. She read Miss Marsh's book on Work Among Navvies, and thus, with fear and trembling, ventured to attempt giving the rough men a tract during their meal hour. This led to an evening school, in which she labored seven years, being greatly helped and guided in the principles of faith-service, by reading the Life of George Muller.

THE LATE MISS ANNIE MACPHERSON

Rev. William Pennefather was just then beginning at Barnet the first united Christian Conference—the precursor of Mildmay—and Miss Macpherson spent annually two weeks with Mrs. Pennefather. In this way she was led to visit Lady Rowley, and to attend the theatre services held by Mr. Reginald Radcliffe, where she met Miss Clara M. Lowe, who took her to visit some poor match-box makers in East London—another turning-point in her life.

The way being opened for a visit to New York, she visited the missions then being established in that city, among which was a Home for Destitute Boys, founded by Mr. Van Meter, who, after training, sent the boys to the Western States. On this visit, the scheme which she so marvelously developed in the way of emigration, began to form in her mind.

London, in 1866, was devastated by the plague, and among the match-box makers there was great sorrow and distress, death leaving many helpless orphans and widows. A fund of $100,000 was raised to feed the destitute and open sewing classes to aid widows. This was the starting-point of "The Home of Industry," with its many forms of evangelistic and helpful service.

Miss Macpherson was specially attracted by the street Arabs, many of whom meant to be honest, while others lived by thieving and begging. She made bold to ask a group of these boys to come and take tea with her; but was told: "We chaps don't want religion licked down our throats." Subsequently two hundred were gathered in a room lent for the purpose by Mr. George Holland. After a good meal, a talk on "The Prodigal Son" moved many of the lads to tears. "That night," says Miss Macpherson, "I knew God had called me, and my life was consecrated to the work of reclamation."

A small house was rented, and thirty homeless orphans received. Others were taken (one for boys and two for girls), and all four speedily filled. Then a warehouse in Commercial Street, Spitalfields, previously used as a cholera hospital, was opened in February, 1869, as "The Home of Industry," and quickly filled, became the centre of a large mission work, with sewing-classes, mothers' meetings, evening schools, Sunday Schools, for adults as well as for children. The Bible Flower Mission, which afterward spread all over England and America, also had its origin here.

In placing the rescued boys in situations, difficulties arose from the proximity of old haunts and companions. Already some fifty families had been sent out to Canada, but the emigration of boys had not been thought of. At length she determined that, if God sent the money—without direct appeal to any one—it would be taken as a signal to go forward. Early in 1870 a thousand pounds were sent in, and this decided her to transplant a party of boys in Canada, who set sail May 12, 1870, under her personal care. At Quebec a telegram was sent to the government by the port officials, describing the boys as well-behaved and likely to be of service on farms, and orders were sent to entertain the party and the lady, and to forward them on to Toronto. Homes were soon found, and two other parties—one of boys and one of girls—followed the same year. Up to 1903 seventy-six companies of children had been sent out, making a total of 6,500 transported, without one serious accident.

The first Distributing Home was a free gift from the town council of Belleville, Ontario. A second opened at Knowlton, is used as the Distribution Home for the Liverpool children emigrated by Mrs. Birt, Miss Macpherson's only surviving sister. A third Home was opened in 1872, in Galt, but in 1883 gave way to a new Home at Stratford, Ontario. Miss Macpherson says:

"Our aim in all the work has been, not only the rescue of the body, but the salvation of the soul. The good seed has been sown in faith and prayer in our home training, and fostered in many a godly Canadian family. Many are now acceptable ministers. Some are in China, Africa, and other lands as missionaries. Large numbers are professional or business men, while the majority are quiet, steady farmers, active members of various Christian churches. For others we still pray and hope."

Besides this emigration movement, a large evangelistic and home mission work centres in The Home of Industry, Bethnal Green Road, London. First the Widows' Sewing Class. The weekly sixpence in many cases, is the poor aged one's only regular support. The class meets each Monday, the members do two hours' sewing, have a plain tea and a sixpence each. A very large Mothers' Meeting has also been sustained for many years. The members are taught about practical home duties and the care of children and Gospel truth, and many have been won to Christ. An afternoon Mothers' Sunday School, also for those who cannot get to an evening service, has gone on for thirty years. As to the Sunday Schools, three floors are crowded Sunday afternoons.

Ladies from The Home of Industry have, also, with the help of voluntary speakers for years kept up two open air services. Former notorious pugilists, atheists, and drunkards, converted, bravely testify before their old companions.

One word as to the Bible Flower Mission. Twenty-five years ago a bunch of violets, enclosed in a letter to The Home of Industry, was passed around among the widows, that each might "have a smell," and then sent to a dying woman, who passed away clasping it in her hand. This incident led to the proposal that friends should be asked to send a few blossoms; and now once every week ladies unpack baskets of flowers, from all parts, making up posies and attaching text-cards, which are then taken to the sick and dying in hospitals, infirmaries and homes. A mission in Spain sprang out of a bunch of flowers and its text, given in an East End Hospital twenty years ago.

Gave Up the Opera for Christ

How Gustave Blomgren, Singer, Left the Stage to Win Souls for the Master

AT different times, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has recorded instances of men and women occupying brilliant positions before the world, who, on becoming converted, consecrated their talents to Christ's service, and gave up their careers in exchange for a life of humble, earnest, Christian work. Such a case is that of Gustave Blomgren. He was born in 1854, in the town of Willmanstrand, state of Wiborg, Finland, and was surrounded by cultured influences from childhood. His parents were wealthy people, of artistic tastes. The father was a talented amateur musician, and the mother was also an accomplished pianist. The home training which Gustave and his brother received in languages, proved of great benefit in their after careers. Only Russian and German were allowed in the family conversation, Swedish and Finnish being used in talking with the household servants.

Gustave was taught music three times a week by good teachers. Later he was placed under the care of private teachers, both for his education in the regular branches, and in music as well. He possessed a splendid tenor voice, clear and strong, and of unusual compass. For several years he sang in concerts throughout Finland. His favorite songs at this time were the work of Donizetti, Heland, the French composer Durand, and, above all, Pacius, the greatest of Finnish composers, who was then teaching in the University at Helsingfors. In the beautiful opera house of the Finnish capital, the young tenor sang in "La Belle Helene," but in an inconspicuous part. His voice was a high tenor, reaching high "C" without any trace of falsetto.

In 1888 he came to America. His singing at a concert given on board ship attracted the attention of a number of prominent passengers, who gave him a letter of introduction which aided him in securing a position in the Metropolitan Opera House, in New York. He took the part of a priest in the opera of "The Queen of Sheba." Most of the productions in which he appeared were by Wagner, whom the young tenor considers the world's greatest composer.

Here he intended to make music his lifework. "But," he said, smiling at the recollection, "the Lord had another use for me." He met the late Mr. Moody and Mr. Ira D. Sankey in Chicago, and attended many of their services there, being invited by the great evangelist to sing at some of those meetings, which he did, with the result that Mr. Moody urged him to devote his life to evangelistic song.

At that time the great change in Mr. Blomgren's heart had not taken place. It was on his return trip to Finland in 1895, that he first experienced the desire to leave the life of the world, with all its glitter and fascination and applause, to be a worker in the Lord's vineyard. He had always had a reverent interest in the teachings of the Christian religion, but he dates his conversion from this homeward voyage, when he heard the call which impelled him to make the great decision. Once back in his fatherland, he offered his services to the British and Foreign Bible Society, and became one of their most active workers, preaching and singing throughout Finland, in churches of all denominations.

Three years ago he was called to America as the pastor of the Finnish Church in upper New York, which had at that time only a handful of members. He has had the gratification of seeing this small flock grow to a church of over one hundred.

GUSTAVE BLOMGREN
Once Opera Singer, now Christian Pastor

Pastor Blomgren has not in the least given up his interest in musical matters. His voice is still in perfect condition, and he keeps in touch with the latest compositions, especially those of a religious nature, and has encouraged religious concerts in his own congregation in New York. At his own church he frequently sings solos, and every Saturday evening he personally trains a choir of twelve members in the spiritual songs to be sung next day. On a recent Sunday he sang by invitation to the men of the Bowery Mission.

Mr. Blomgren's church has its home at present in a hall at 29 East 135th Street, New York. There are three services every Sunday and a weekday prayer-meeting. The Sunday evening service always taxes the seating capacity of the hall. There is a Young People's Society of sixty members, which is similar to the Christian Endeavor Society in English-speaking churches. His congregation is working earnestly to secure a church of their own. They wish to erect a three-story building, the first story to be used for the religious services, the second as the home of the pastor, and the third as a home for Finnish immigrants. As about three hundred Finns come here every week, the desirability of such a home is apparent. The proposed structure will cost at least $10,000.

In addition to his work in New York, Mr. Blomgren preaches every Wednesday in New Rochelle, and once a month in Mount Vernon, to the Finnish people in those places. He also takes frequent trips to preach to Finnish congregations in other parts of the country. Every Thursday afternoon, he holds services in the Immigrant House, 9 State Street, for the Finnish women immigrants. On meagre resources—for his congregation is very poor—this devoted pastor, who once shone before brilliant audiences, is faithfully fulfilling his mission in the Gospel field, and his work has been attended by much blessing.

Called Higher

Mrs. Priscilla M. Jones died at Elm Creek, Neb., Dec. 10th 1904, aged seventy-three years and twelve days. Mrs. Jones was a consistent, steadfast Christian, and a member of the Methodist Church from her youth, until her death.

Mrs. Mary A. Gard died at her home in New London, Conn., on Dec. 16, 1904 in the ninety-eighth year of her age. She was a member of the Federal Street Methodist Church for seventy-four years. A grand-daughter of Mrs. Gard writes: "No one among your many subscribers enjoyed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD more than she did. When able to do so, she always read it from beginning to end, and since her eyesight failed, she has eagerly listened to its contents read by some member of the family. From among your valuable premiums she has supplied children and grandchildren with no less than a dozen Bibles, and many other good books. Children and grandchildren have indeed risen up to call her blessed."

At Albright, Ind., Dec. 27, 1904, Cursen J. Stright was called home, at the age of sixty-seven years. The days of his youth were passed amid the trials of pioneer life. His father came to Indiana as a Methodist missionary many years ago. Mr. Stright was loved by all who knew him, and lived a consistent Christian life.

Philip Fisher was born Oct. 11, 1833, in Rays Cove, Bedford Co., Pa., and died Dec. 17, 1904, in Newport, Tenn., being a little over seventy-one years at the time of his death. Mr. Fisher was a faithful member of the Methodist Church, a justice of the peace for many years, and held strong views of the high character required to meet the obligations of a citizen, a man, and a Christian. He was a plain, unassuming man, and did well every duty assigned him.

At Attalla, Ala., on April 6th, Mrs. E. Shahan passed away to a better life. She was born Nov. 8, 1822, and united with the Methodist Church in 1854. The sick, the needy, the helpless (dumb creatures not excepted), all found in her a faithful friend, and she exemplified in her life the rarest Christian virtues.

Reforms Promised in Russia

The Czar Sees the Workingmen, and Gives Assurance of Material Improvements — A Constitution Probable

RUSSIA has apparently entered upon a new era. The Czar has received a deputation of workingmen, which meeting, if it could have been accomplished before, would probably have prevented the recent lamentable bloodshed in St. Petersburg. The interview can well be regarded as of the utmost importance in the recent history of the empire. It seems as if at last the Czar and his discontented subjects were coming to a better understanding of each other, and of the best interests of the country. Emperor Nicholas promised the workingmen material reforms, and there can be little doubt that these will be carried out in good faith.

The Czar also had an interview with M. Yermoloff, Minister of Agriculture, giving assurance of changes that may result in placing in the hands of the Russian people some share in the government. Men under arrest, charged with sedition, have been released; and there is a prospect that the press will hereafter be allowed to speak more freely.

Thirty-four workmen, from thirty factories of St. Petersburg, were invited to the Emperor's palace at Tsarkoe-Selo. The Czar told them that he had summoned them that they might hear him personally. He said that the workmen had been induced to revolt by the enemies of the country. Many things required improvement, and they must have patience. In closing, he said:

"In my solicitude for the working classes, I will take measures which will assure that everything possible will be done to improve their lot and secure an investigation of their demands through legal channels. I am convinced of the honesty of the workmen and their devotion to myself, and I pardon their transgression. Return to your work with your comrades, and carry out the tasks allotted to you. May God assist you."

Apparently the programme of political reform is already well matured. Minister Yermoloff told the Emperor, it is reported, that it would be impossible henceforth to carry on the business of the Empire without the assistance of the people, and he was ordered to draw up a ukase, to be sent to M. de Witte, President of the Council. In this document, the Council of Ministers is charged to extend and develop the principles of the reforms that were promised more than a month ago. Pensions are to be paid to orphans whose fathers were killed in the massacre of January 22, and order is to be restored by peaceful methods. It is also said that the people will be invited to participate, to some extent, in the national government, but this statement has been questioned. An increase in the powers of the Russian Senate may be the step contemplated in this direction.

Minister Yermoloff said in regard to the interview:

I spoke to his Majesty about the terrible catastrophe of January 22. Possibly I threw some new light and conveyed to the Emperor some facts which until then had not been emphasized. His Majesty was indeed deeply moved to learn the extent of the disaster, which certainly was not in accordance with his orders.

I urged upon his Majesty the advisability of addressing the people directly with an expression of his own views of the distressing calamity. I also took occasion to say that an investigation should be held, and if guilt were found the guilty should receive exemplary punishment. I expressed the view that justice demanded that aid and compensation be given to the sufferers and their families.

Finally, I represented to his Majesty that it would be a wise course for him to consult the people on national affairs. His Majesty deigned to listen to all I said and to take the matter under his most gracious consideration. I did not mention the Zemstvos or a national assembly, leaving his Majesty to decide in what manner he would consult the people. The Emperor agreed that what I said was true.

Medical Missions*

DOUBLY equipped for service is the missionary who is prepared to obey both Christ's commands: Heal the sick, preach the Gospel. The heathen who has suffered bodily pain is prepared to attend to the spiritual teaching of the man who has relieved him. It is an opening gate for the Gospel and has frequently proved effectual. Dr. Lynch, the Baptist missionary in Africa, tells of a district which had firmly, almost fiercely, refused to receive missionaries. But one day a young woman was carried through the village. She was too ill to walk. Her friends said they were taking her to the Christian Mission. A few weeks afterwards she walked back perfectly restored. She told the people how she had been healed. They said, "We must have misunderstood the people at the Mission. They are for our good," and they sent an invitation to the missionaries to come and teach them the Gospel.

Besides this indirect service, which is the main object of the medical missionary, there is the blessed satisfaction of bringing health and healing to the people. It is heartrending to listen to the superstitious practices of the native doctors. How the sick person is tortured and maltreated with the idea of expelling the demon that has caused the sickness; how diseases, easily curable by modern science, prostrate their victims, who must lie and bear their pain until death comes; how in an epidemic, numbers of persons are strangled or hacked to pieces, to propitiate the offended deity—all this we are told is going on, and has been going on for ages. The advent of a medical missionary brings life and hope into the homes, and it is followed by acceptance of the Saviour, whom the missionary preaches. It was a glorious day for Christ's cause when the first medical missionary went forth to heal and to preach.

Dr. Chamberlain of India tells how a Brahman, whose daughter he had healed, insisted on worshiping him. The doctor reproved him and struggled to get away, but the father said, "No man could have healed the girl if God had not helped him; thank him for me."

*Topic of the Epworth League for Feb. 26. Matt. 11: 2-5; Acts 3: 1-8.

Home Missionaries*

THE romance of foreign missions, and the self-denial and hardships of the missionaries, have somewhat eclipsed the devoted work of the home missionary. Yet how important is the service he renders! There are no busier lives anywhere than those of the conscientious home missionaries in such cities as New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and other huge aggregations of humanity. In all our cities there are enormous numbers who never go to church at all, and have no conception of the blessings that religion would bring to them. Though they are the people whose need of Christianity is the bitterest, whose daily trials and temptations call for precisely the benefits that religion supplies, they seldom think of going to the Church for help. It is the home missionary's work to find out such people and point them to the help they need. The work is difficult, for too often the people are prejudiced against the Church, which does so little to relieve the burdens that are crushing them, and gives them so cold a welcome if they enter its portals. The missionary has to teach them that Christianity had its first followers among the poor, and that its Founder ever showed a warm sympathy with them, and still makes them a charge on his people. How hard does the missionary often find it to convince them of the fact.

Then, too, how onerous are his visits to the sick! It is very different going into a stifling garret, where a poor consumptive or fever-stricken sufferer is lying, from visiting the home of a wealthy patient whose chamber is provided with comforts and there is abundant ventilation. How much might be done for the missionary and his people by providing him with means to relieve the necessities of the patients, or with delicacies to tempt the failing appetite. Such help would be a blessing to him and his sick friends, and so a double blessing would be effected.

The home missionary is the link between the Church and the people that brings them together. He should receive all the support and honor that can be given him.

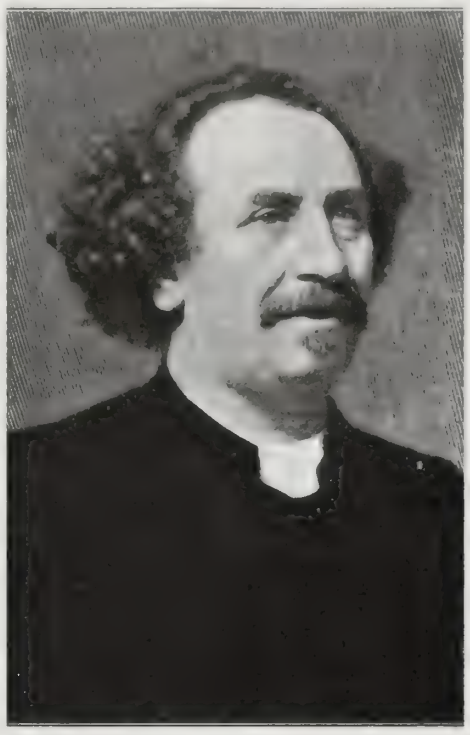
A New Evangelistic Tour

WHILE American preachers are helping their English brethren and are winning thousands of souls to Christ on the other side the Atlantic, we are, during the next few months, to have the benefit of the labors of a distinguished English preacher. The advantages of these exchanges have been easily realized. It is not that the visiting minister has any new truth to present, but that he may have a new mode of presenting it that, by its unfamiliarity, appeals to his hearers. It is likely to be so in the case of Rev. W. J. Dawson, our English visitor, who has already on a former visit won the hearts of our people.

Mr. Dawson is widely known through his books, such as Makers of English Poetry, Makers of English Prose, a volume of verse and a Life of Christ. He is known also as a lecturer and as a preacher. His ministerial work has been in the Highbury Quadrant Church in London. It is announced that he will not employ the methods which have been employed in former evangelistic movements. He stands for a movement which is known as the "New Evangelism." This, as its leaders explain, "is an appeal to people to all that is highest and best in man; an appeal to follow Christ because that is the right thing to do. It does not emphasize the dark side of human character and of future experience, but it emphasizes the life of union and fellowship with God, getting right with him, and through realizing God in all things, realize the sacredness of life in all its aspects, whether commercial, social, industrial, or religious. It is an appeal to man to put himself fully alongside of Christ and in fellowship with him, and to be guided in all things by the Holy Spirit."



REV. W. J. DAWSON

It is intended that during the next three months Mr. Dawson shall visit our chief cities in the East and West. He will begin his work in New England early this month, at Pittsfield, Mass., and will work in Boston, Bangor, Portland, and other New England cities. He will begin in Boston, February 19th, continuing two weeks, probably in Tremont Temple. A circular letter is now out to the pastors from the Boston Committee, calling them and their people to prayer and preparation for the work of the Spirit. In this they call attention to the fact that all the great evangelistic movements have been preceded by intense prayer, and prayer has been a marked feature of the movements throughout. The movement in Wales is largely a revival of the prayer meeting. It is suggested that there be formed prayer circles in the churches, and neighborhood and cottage meetings, as well as earnest individual prayer for the outpouring of the Spirit.

A decision day is also suggested, either that which has been adopted by many churches of different denominations, for Sunday Schools and Young People's meetings, or some other Sunday in the near future. Personal and social salvation through the acceptance of Christ is urged. In the letter to be sent to the churches by the National Committee of the Congregational churches are these words, "There is only one principal task laid upon the Church of Christ. It is to bring all men into living relations with God through the Gospel of his Incarnate Son."

New York and near-by States will be visited during this evangelistic tour, probably from March 6 until April 2, after which the West will be visited. The general plan is to meet the pastors of the churches in the afternoon of each day and conduct evangelistic meetings in the evenings. Full suggestions are to be sent to pastors for their preparation for Mr. Dawson's coming, and for following up his meetings after he goes away.

The movement is an outcome of a resolution passed by the National Council of Congregational Churches in Des Moines, in October last, which appointed an Evangelistic Committee of nine prominent ministers of the denomination from various parts, with Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis as chairman. Dr. Hillis urged Mr. William J. Dawson to remain a week and conduct a series of evangelistic services in Plymouth Church. This he did, and good results followed these meetings, both intensive in deepening the spiritual experience of professing Christians, and extensive in the conversion of others. The Committee was so impressed with these meetings that it arranged with Dr. Dawson to return to America and to make an evangelistic tour.

The chief feature of the "New Evangelism," on which Mr. Dawson relies for success, is the historic Christ and the Christ of experience. "The great truth," says one leader, "upon which the Church rests is the Person and Life of Christ. The emphasis in evangelistic methods in the new time, should be altogether on the realization of the presence of God." This seems to be the prevailing idea at the present time, in all the religious awakening which is everywhere making itself felt. The work of the Spirit, which is at present going on in Britain, especially in Wales, attests that God is making his presence and power known among men. It is a most promising sign of the times. It is hoped that such a work of the Spirit will spread throughout the world.

Making Restitution

WHEN the spiritual man is quickened, conscience becomes active, and if there is any wrong to be righted or any evil action to be undone, there is no rest until the duty is accomplished. Mr. Moody frequently told of cases where new converts were in haste to make generous restitution where they had acted dishonestly while in sin. A correspondent of this paper (Mr. D. B. R., a business man of Fredonia, Pa.), writes to us concerning a very striking instance of this character. He lately received a letter from Meadville, Pa., which said:

Dear Sir: Several years ago I took some things out of your store without paying for them, to the amount of about $2. Enclosed you will find this amount. Since I have become truly converted, the Lord showed me what I should do, and now I repay you. The Lord has forgiven me and I hope you will do the same. May God bless and reward you. A FRIEND.

Mr. R., who received this letter, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

As the dear Lord has touched his heart, so the same spirit tells me to send this money to you to use for His good. If you think best, use it for the Bowery Mission, and may God rescue many other souls through its influence. God bless this man. I truly forgive him.

Wouldn't Take $25 for it

I have received my book, Good Manners for All Occasions, and have read it through. I wouldn't take $25 for it. I have received your Calendar, too. It is a fine thing.

Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau

THE Bureau was opened on Jan. 1, 1905, and in the month ending Jan. 31, 110 men have secured employment through its agency. Of these, 36 were sent to positions in Greater New York, and the remaining 74 to the following States:

New Jersey, 27; New York, 37; Pennsylvania, 2; Connecticut, 4; Massachusetts, 3; Vermont, 1; Greater New York, 36; total, 110.

So far as heard from, almost every man has given satisfaction. Care has been taken in the selection of the men. They have all had an opportunity of attending the Mission meetings, although many paid their first visit to the Mission purely for the purpose of registering for employment. They have come into touch with the kindly ministry of Mrs. Bird and the other leaders, and have, in nearly every case, gone to their newly-found positions with the most determined resolution to live good, honest, upright lives.

Every possible care is taken of the men whilst they are waiting for positions, although the demands upon the Mission in this respect are very great. Meals and beds are provided for needy applicants to the utmost limit of the Mission's resources. When everything has been arranged, the men are sent in charge of William Graham, the messenger of the Bureau, who sees them on to the train, and gives them the last words of kindly counsel.

On one of Graham's first visits to the Grand Central Station, the ticket-clerk looked up, smiled, and said: "Thank God for the Bowery Mission! I am one of its converts."

The gratitude of these men, who, through the instrumentality of the Bureau, are lifted out of homelessness and destitution, and placed in positions where they can earn an honest living, is very touching. Letters received from many of them are brimming over with joyfulness and thanksgiving for their changed circumstances.

Letters of inquiry are now coming in in great numbers, and everything in connection with the Bureau indicates that a most interesting field of usefulness has providentially been opened out for the Old Bowery Mission.

Work of the Prison-Gate Mission

CHAPLAIN John J. Munro, of the Prison-Gate Mission, reports very encouraging progress in the work of helping the lately released men, to lead honest, Christian lives. He writes to this journal:

"Your kind and favorable commendation of the truly humanitarian work of helping the ex-prisoner on his feet, has not been in vain. A short time ago we opened the Prison-Gate Mission at 192 Elm Street, New York, where daily we meet men just out of prison. If in need of food or a night's lodging, we furnish the same till they are on their feet again; then we endeavor to secure for them some kind of employment. Thus far we have been able to secure employment for about ten per cent. of our applicants.

"We are very grateful to you for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and its readers for their kind interest and sympathy in the work, and trust it may continue. The work of reaching and rehabilitating the discharged prisoner is one of the most important and deserving of charities, and though we have only recently launched in this work, we can show excellent results already."

During the first month of the Mission work, positions were obtained for twenty-two ex-prisoners, all of whom are doing well, and striving hard, with God's help, to become worthy citizens and good Christians. Several hundred have been advised with, and a considerable number have been helped with free meals and otherwise, while waiting for employment. The Mission Treasurer, Banker A. A. Knowles, 33 Wall Street, will send acknowledgments for all contributions in aid of the work.

O Bluebird

By B. F. M. Sours

HARK! o'er the fields I hear a bluebird singing,
It is the first glad harbinger of Spring.
Just from the Southland; now its weary wing
Rests, till it sets the hills and valleys ringing.
O bluebird, from the far off sunshine winging,
Why did you seek a home where everything
Is icelocked still? You are the first to bring
The gladsome song of dandelions springing.
Earth waits the voice of hope. We worry so.
We soon forget the Hand that rules above,
And grieve because the summer is no more.
But then some bluebird, O, when tempests blow,
Warbles its song of God's eternal love!
Will there be bluebirds on the heavenly shore?

Persian Murderers Punished

On March 13, 1904, the Rev. Benjamin W. Labaree, an American missionary in Persia, was murdered near Urmi, by Kurdish fanatics. Through the American minister, a demand was made upon the Persian government for the arrest and punishment of the murderers. This demand, being unheeded, was repeated with emphasis on October, when the Shah's government became duly impressed with the importance of compliance, and began to act. Mir Chafar, the leader of the bandits, and several of his associates were arrested. They were sentenced to death; but the fact that Mir Chafar was a lineal descendant of the prophet, induced the Persian government to save his life, paying instead a heavy pecuniary indemnity. On Jan. 3, last, $30,000 was paid to the American Legation for the widow of Mr. Labaree, and assurances were given that the accomplices of Mir Chafar would meet with speedy punishment, as promised.

"The Road to Wellville" Pointed the Way

Down at Hot Springs, Ark., the visitors have all sorts of complaints, but it is a subject of remark that the great majority of them have some trouble with stomach and bowels. This may be partly attributed to the heavy medicines.

Naturally, under the conditions, the question of food is very prominent.

A young man states that he had suffered for nine years from stomach and bowel trouble, had two operations which did not cure, and was at last threatened with appendicitis.

He went to Hot Springs for rheumatism and his stomach trouble got worse. One day at breakfast the waiter, knowing his condition, suggested he try Grape-Nuts and cream, which he did, and found the food agreed with him perfectly.

After the second day he began to sleep peacefully at night, different than he had for years. The perfect digestion of the food quieted his nervous system and made sleep possible.

He says: "The next morning I was astonished to find my condition of constipation had disappeared. I could not believe it true after suffering for so many years; then I took more interest in the food, read the little book "The Road to Wellville," and started following the simple directions.

"I have met with such results that in the last five weeks I have gained eight pounds in spite of hot baths which take away the flesh from any one.

"A friend of mine has been entirely relieved of a bad case of indigestion and stomach trouble by using Grape-Nuts Food and cream alone for breakfast.

"There is one thing in particular—I have noticed a great change in my mental condition. Formerly I could hardly remember anything, and now the mind seems unusually acute and retentive. I can memorize practically anything I desire." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Jesus, the Provider

By MRS. M. BAXTER

THE Lord Jesus comes before us especially as the Son of God in the Gospel of John. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," is the light in which we have to read this Gospel, and again that wondrous light on the transfiguration given in one single verse by John, the only eye-witness who wrote of it. "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory of the Only Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." John could not describe it as the other evangelists who had not seen it did. But in the light of this concentrated adoration, let us read this Gospel. The Lord Jesus, the Son of God, had been declared by John the Baptist to be "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world;" and therefore the fulfilment of all the sacrifices from that of Abel downwards.

All which is recorded of him in this Gospel speaks of his Divine personality. At the marriage feast, the elements of nature must bow before their Creator, and the water became wine. In his interview with Nicodemus, the learned scribe must be convicted of his ignorance, in the presence of him who gave man knowledge. The sins of the Samaritan woman must come to light in such a Presence; the sickness of the nobleman's son must yield to his word spoken miles away, and the impotent man at Bethesda's pool must know that the word of such an One—"Arise"—was in itself the power which released the limbs bound for thirty-eight years. All spoke of One who was more than man. And yet the Jews had not learned who it was that walked among them. Such a king as Saul, such a criminal as Barabbas, were more welcome to the chosen people of God at this time, than his own Son manifest in the flesh!

"His disciples believed on him" (John 2: 11); "many believed in his name when they saw the miracles which he did." Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman believed on him (John 3: 4); the nobleman and his household believed (John 4: 53); but the authorities of the Jews, secular and spiritual, did not believe, but they sought to kill him (John 5: 16-18). Jesus bore witness against them concerning the Father, "Ye have not his Word abiding in you; for whom he hath sent, him ye believe not. Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me, and ye will not come to me that ye might have life. . . . I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. How can ye believe who seek honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only" (John 5: 38-44)?

It was part of his vocation, as the Son of God on earth, to rise superior to all his surroundings, and to continue his works of compassion and power, even though the earthly authorities were always using their influence and their power to thwart and to oppose him. Thus we find him teaching and healing in spite of his adversaries, and doing always those things which pleased his Father, yet at all times doing nothing of himself; "the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works" (John 14: 10).

In this Gospel, as well as in all the other three, we have an account of his feeding the multitude. "A great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles which he did on them that were diseased." This is the only Gospel which tells us in so many words the reason of this concourse of people. The Lord, after the death of John the Baptist, had called the disciples aside into the desert to rest awhile, but their rest was short, soon interrupted by the multitudes which followed them, and the teaching and healing went on as usual. Jesus went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples. "And the Passover, a feast of the Jews, was nigh." This was the second Passover during his ministry, the first being when Jesus first cleansed the temple (John 2: 13-25), and the third was that great passover when he himself was sacrificed on the cross. "When Jesus then lifted up his eyes, and saw a great company come unto him, he saith unto Philip, Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat? And this he said to prove him, for he himself knew what he would do.

HOW IT CAME ABOUT

Story of the Formation of the United Cities Realty Corporation

THIRTY years ago the instalment business in this country was scarcely respectable. The life insurance companies were really the only institutions which took the money of individuals in instalments and returned to them an honest and fair compensation. Respectable people in other lines of business fought shy of adopting the instalment methods, and it was left to cheap furniture houses and other schemes for distributing mean products at high prices. Yet lying dormant here was a principle involving great business possibilities, and the firm of Wood, Harmon & Co. recognized it. We predicted at that time that in years to come all business, more or less, would be done on instalments; that is to say, by using the capacity of people to save in accumulating funds for any legitimate purpose or product. In selecting the direction in which to apply our theories, it seemed to us that the home-owning instinct was the strongest impulse in the American heart, and we determined to see if the instalment idea, carried out in a thoroughly respectable and upright manner in procuring homes for people of limited means, might not become popular. It has. We have certainly proved it, and in the largest and most emphatic way.

The history of Wood, Harmon & Co. is too well known to need repeating, and while this business of ours has been developing, the instalment principle has been taken up by scores of houses of the highest repute, representing various utilities, until now it is recognized as respectable when in the hands of respectable people.

Until the purchase of our Brooklyn properties, which represent exceptional possibilities of profit, owing to certain local conditions, we have always pressed the idea of the purchase of lots situated adjacent to other cities for homes rather than investment. Brooklyn's limited territory and the fact that it is part of a municipality of 4,000,000 people warrant our attitude in recommending our extensive holdings in that borough for investment, certain to be profitable when the problem of adequate transportation has been solved.

During this entire period we have been besieged by people desiring to make investments, and we have learned to a certain degree the infinite capacity of the country to support an institution reared upon the highest standards of business morality, which would be devoted to a conservative income producing investment business. While we were learning this fact we were also learning the possibilities of a certain class of real estate. You hear it said—it is almost an axiom—that up to a few years ago the greatest fortunes of the country were made in real estate, and the general public is apt to believe that all real estate is included, whereas in truth it applies mainly to but one type of real estate, and that is business real estate used for general purposes. If you will follow the history of any particular piece of income producing business property in any city with which you are familiar, from the date it first began to produce an income until now, if the history covers a period of not less than twenty to thirty years, you will see that the land has increased in value over the whole period; not continuously perhaps, but it has, generally speaking, increased in value about the same percentage as the community in which it is located has increased in size. The fact is, it is absolutely proven that no form of property, real or personal, is so constant in its growth as this class of real estate when located in growing cities.

With these facts in mind, and with a knowledge of the vast number of people who are anxious to earn more than the savings institutions can afford to pay them, we started the United Cities Realty Corporation. It was organized to combine these two great principles: The joint instalment moneys of the millions with a form of investment that had never in the history of the country shown a general widespread cessation of increase in value.

If we can "make two blades of grass grow where one has grown before," if we can provide technical skill for those who do not possess it, if we can furnish an example for other institutions to follow by showing the big, the capable, the honest financial leaders that there is a certain obligation which they owe to the toiler, and which they can legitimately pay with advantage to both parties in the transaction, we will have accomplished all we set out to do. It makes no difference if we receive subscriptions for $1,000,000 or $100,000,000. We are satisfied to share the possibilty of benefiting the wage earner, adding his savings to the wealth of the country, and are content with our moderate compensation.

The underlying principle upon which the business of the life insurance companies was founded—protection for those whose support was removed by death—appealed to the masses, and their indorsement of the principle is evidenced by the enormous amount of life insurance that has been sold. But life insurance companies were not primarily intended to be investment concerns, and they are departing from the foundation principle when their business takes on that aspect. It is true that where an essential part of the consideration is the protection of dependent ones there is a certain appropriateness to the investment side of endowment policies as incidental, but to those who desire to provide for their own future the savings banks have a better claim on their savings except for one fact, and that is that life insuranee is to a certain degree a compulsory form of saving, while a savings bank account is subject to the temptation to draw upon it. And yet the savings banks are growing in deposits and in depositors, as are the life insurance companies.

Now, is it not plain that there is a great field for an organization or a series of organizations in the hands of men of the highest respectability and the highest ideals, devoted to investment primarily? Heretofore men of reputation and high moral character would not lend themselves to the instalment investment business, as when, twenty years ago and the few years following, we were practically the only people in the instalment lot business. To-day the sale of lots by instalments is done in a thoroughly clean manner all over the United States, and in the years to come the investment business will be carried on in the same manner. Whatever advantage may be derived from being first in the field we will have, but we will have also the satisfaction of knowing that we have promulgated a principle which has added to the power and the usefulness of the dollar which is saved by the wage earner, and that will be our monument.

United Cities Realty Corporation

THE preferred shares of the United Cities Realty Corporation are now selling with great rapidity. The business for the first ninety days of our fiscal year, which began November 1, is five times the amount of business done during the same period of the past year. Last week's sales report shows subscriptions from thirteen States, and new men in different sections of the country are constantly being added to those who are selling the preferred shares. We expect to close the first series of the preferred stock of the United Cities Realty Corporation within the next sixty days. This series has taken over two years to sell, but we shall be much surprised if the second series cannot be disposed of within one year.

Wood, Harmon & Co. have purchased many millions of dollars' worth of property during their business career, extending over a period of eighteen years, and their selections have always been made with the utmost care, but never in their entire history have they been more cautious in making advantageous purchases than in those which have been acquired for the United Cities Realty Corporation. Every effort has been made to provide for any possible contingency, and the result is that this corporation to-day owns $1,000,000 worth of remarkably well situated improved real estate, which is earning a net income of over 9 per cent. on the Corporation's investment.

The outcome of the first series, both from the standpoint of increased values in the future and present and continuous income, is beyond question, and there is therefore a certain advantage in owning shares in this series. The extreme desirability of this investment must be obvious to all, and that more and more people are recognizing its value as time goes on is evidenced by the intense interest shown by the many inquiries we receive. Not a day passes without bringing new subscribers, not a week without enlisting new agents. The volume of business in store for us is simply enormous, and as it grows we shall be able to buy more generously and to spread our purchases out over a greater number of cities. Every piece of property we buy is purchased with a view to its increase in value over its purchase price and also a continuous income. When the preferred shares of the United Cities Realty Corporation were first put in the market, we sold them with the feeling that we would be doing well to pay dividends at the rate of 5 per cent. during the first few years, but so successful were our purchases that the dividends paid last year were at the rate of 6 per cent., while the earnings advanced to 9 per cent.; and this notwithstanding the initial expense incidental to the formation of so important an enterprise. What we have done before we feel we can accomplish again, and it is with that confidence we commend the second series to the attention of the investing public. Of course, the first series, with its magnificent array of investment purchases, is now in an invulnerable position, both on account of its high earnings and the fact that there is hardly one of its properties which could not be sold at a very substantial advance over what the Corporation paid for it. These two factors, namely, the increase in value and the rate of earnings, justify a much higher price than that which we are charging to-day, but until the second series is ready for the market we will continue to sell shares in the first series at $120 each; after that these shares will cost you considerably more. In other words, you have only a short time in which to purchase shares in the first series at to-day's price. Sales are made for cash or by instalments of $5 to $10 a month. A postal to the undersigned will bring particulars.

SWEDEN'S FAMINE BARRIER

A LESSON TAUGHT THROUGH SUFFERING — A PERMANENT RELIEF FUND ESTABLISHED

By LOUISE D. MITCHELL

FAR up in the north of Sweden, where, in the bleak winter season, the sunshine pales at noonday into the gray of approaching night, are the wild lands of Norrbotten, little known to the world at large until two years ago, when all eyes were attracted to this province by the far-reaching cry of its famine-stricken people. Vast forests—whose solitudes are disturbed only by the barking of the wolf and the distant blow of the axe of the woodsman, whom necessity of livelihood has driven into the grim silence of the wilderness—cover miles of that part of the country. Peat-bogs, at once the terror and the salvation of the isolated farmers, dot the country here and there, like the marks of a dreaded disease. Mountains, the grandeur of whose snow-crowned heights lend a sense of implacability to a scene already made desolate by its silence and remoteness, make of this part of Scandinavia one of nature's unconquerable fortresses against the advance of man. Across all, the north wind sweeps the hosts of its icy blasts, and leaves behind it wastes of snow and ice, and bitter suffering for man and beast.

But, as though to mitigate this rough treatment, nature offers to Norrbotten seemingly interminable days during the two months of summer, which she apportions to it when the sun shines day and night, though, at night, with the glow of a late afternoon, only producing the weird and melancholy effect of a slowly dying day, which is loath to resign the sceptre it has held so long.

The people of this region are a mild, taciturn, but shiftless type; shiftless, no doubt, because there is little to work for even with the best intentions, and plenty to discourage effort. To supplement the scanty living derived from tilling the soil, many of the farmers hire themselves out to the sawmill companies as loggers, and to fell the trees already "blazed" or branded for them by the companies' foresters. For this work they are presumed to receive about two kronors and fifty ore per day—about seventy cents in United States coin—but the pay is supposed to be taken out at the company store. These workmen are obliged out of their scanty earnings, to furnish their own food and fodder for their horses—used in hauling the logs—and, finding themselves getting deeper and deeper in the company's debt for these and other things, as each day passes, until there is nothing left to look forward to but work without pay, and debt that means the loss of home, cattle and anything else upon which an attachment could be made for debt, naturally realize their position in all of its hopelessness. The consequence is, that the farmer is finally driven to the point where he has to select one of two ways of facing starvation, and no one can criticise him adversely, that he instinctively selects that to be found under his own roof-tree.

A RUGGED FJORD OF SCANDINAVIA

The Norrbotten farmer, in times of necessity, will go to any length to help himself before he will permit the outside world to know his strait. His live stock is naturally his wealth—the cows an actual means of subsistence—and he, therefore, will not part with them, excepting under great pressure of need. Thus it is that when word comes to the settlements, and from there to the cities, that he is slaughtering his cows, it is indicative of the fact that his condition is desperate indeed. It is his pathetic admission that he "kills for food." It was this news during the winter of 1902-3, that turned all eyes from all parts of the world toward Sweden.

It is worthy of note, however, that it was not until the energy and charity of America made itself felt in Sweden, that actual measures were taken by the Swedish Government to bring relief to the stricken districts. The indefatigable efforts of Mr. D. O. Bell, an American gentleman, long resident in Stockholm, who interested himself in the famine sufferers for humanity's sake, and whose noble labor has been recently recognized by King Oscar (who sent him a large photograph of himself in gala court uniform, with all his decorations on, and inscribed with the date, and his Majesty's own signature, and, accompanied by a letter, which informed him that the photograph was sent as "a token of his Majesty's sincere gratitude for Mr. Bell's grand work during the famine of 1902-3"), forced matters to a stirring issue, and quick relief reached the needy thereafter. The story of that time of terrible suffering is too recent, and, therefore, too fresh in the minds of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to require details.

It is little wonder, therefore, that the appeal for help from the afflicted provinces touched the heart and the purse of those who heard it, and that money poured in from royal-hearted America without stint. The largest gift to arrive in one sum from the States was from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, through Dr. Louis Klopsch, and amounted to about 100,000 kronors. (A kronor is equal to about twenty-seven cents in the coin of the United States). This donation was received about the 23d of March, 1903. This, and another donation of 18,655 kronors came through the efforts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to collect a fund for the sufferers, and 12,000 people contributed to that amount. 75,000 kronors of the money sent by Dr. Klopsch were forwarded directly to the Norrbotten provinces.

To avert slothfulness on the part of the peasant—a condition with which Gov. Bergstrom knows well how to cope—the money was used with care and intelligence in its distribution. Some of the money received was used in supplying them with seed-grain and seed-potatoes, so that they would be able to sow and to plant as soon as the frost was out of the ground, that they need not face the same grim fate upon the approach of the next winter, for the result of unsowed fields is the same as that of flooded or frosted ground—it means famine. Fodder and rape-cake were purchased for the emaciated cattle and horses. Where it was needed by a widow or destitute family, whose only means of livelihood depended upon its possession, a horse was purchased and given to them, but only in exchange for a written agreement from the beneficiary, that he or she would insure the horse, and every three months deposit a certain sum of money in the savings-bank, with the clever purpose of permitting an accumulation of money that, in event of the horse dying or becoming too old to work, the depositor should have the wherewithal to purchase another. The pass-book of the savings-bank was kept by some reliable person, who was expected to see that the money was not drawn out and squandered. Some of the money

The Evangelism of Jesus

A SERMON BY REV. W. J. DAWSON, OF LONDON

WHO IS MAKING AN EVANGELISTIC TOUR OF NEW ENGLAND*

THE first thing I want you to notice about these words, is that Christ constantly followed a widening ideal in his ministry. The conception of humanity as a whole is very faintly present in Christ's earlier ministry. He says on one occasion distinctly: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." On another occasion, when he sends forth the first company of missionary disciples to preach his kingdom, the instruction which he gives them is both definite and limited. "Go not," says Christ, "into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." At last he reaches the great proclamation without qualification: "I am come to seek and to save," not the lost sheep only of the house of Israel, but "that which is lost," mankind everywhere, wherever there is a lost man or a lost woman; wherever there is lost virtue; wherever there is lost happiness; wherever there is lost peace; wherever any human creature has gone astray as a lost sheep, there is my mission. He has come, and this is the final and the adequate definition, and the only definition of Christianity for us, Christ has come, and Christ has sent us to seek and to save, without any qualification, that which is lost.

Christ's Infinite Pity

And then, again, there was the education of pity. Jesus looked upon the multitude and was sad. A great multitude is always a sad sight. Look into their faces, try to read what the lines mean, what the furrows suggest. Think of the fire of unshed tears in those eyes. Mark what sorrow has done and what sin has done with the human face, and there will come home to you presently a sense of great pain when you look on a great multitude, and you will never stop to ask if that man is a Jew, or that man a Samaritan, if that is an Englishman, or that is an American. Humanity is there and all the pity of humanity.

And here, then, it seems to me you have the core and the kernel of what I venture to call the evangelism of Jesus. In the last year of his ministry there is a new note, there is intensity, there is a passion, there are vehement words, there are alarming parables, there are heart-breaking reproaches, and there are tears over Jerusalem, for he sees his goal now and he knows that it is the cross. He yearns now to take the whole world to his heart, and he cries, "How am I straightened until my work is accomplished!"

Ah, my brethren, if Christ had remained only the poet of the Galilean lake, there would have been no redemption for you and me. He would have added something to the world's wisdom, but he would never have broken up the depths of the world's heart. The fact is, that spiritual truth alone never saves anybody. You can't educate the world into new life. No; you have to seek men, you have to suffer for them, you have to die for them, you have to compel their reluctant souls. It was not the wisdom in the words of Christ that has made Christ the world's Saviour. It was the evangelism in the life of Christ. For, observe, he came not to teach, not to educate, not to instruct; he did that, but that was not what he came for; he came to seek and to save that which was lost.

The Education of the Spirit

And now let us observe for a moment or two these sublime processes. Let us look at them in relation to ourselves. The education of the spirit! How shall I interpret that to you? Well, let me put it in this way: It means, in other words, that Christ thought out his truths to the inevitable issue. Have we done it? Take this one truth of the Fatherhood of God. Have you thought it out! Have you thought what it means as regards yourself? Have you come to feel it, not as a passing sentiment, moving like a shadow across the mind now and again when some preacher appeals to you, but have you come to feel as the most vital fact of your existence that you are a child of God? Have you thought your truth out?

Then I turn to the story of Christianity. I take, for example, such a case as Simon Peter's, and I remember what a long time it took Peter to think a truth out. This was the original temper of Peter: It is the day of transfiguration, and Peter is carried out of himself with spiritual emotion and he says, "Lord, it is good for us to be here; let us build three tabernacles, three quiet cloisters, three beautiful, secluded hermitages upon the mountain side, where, shut off from the world, in a sanctified silence, we may worship." That is a very congregational ideal of the church. There are a great number of tabernacle Christians about. Shut the crowd out. Get upon the heights, secure the atmosphere of quiet devotion; it is good for you to be there, no doubt. but what is that down at the bottom of the mountain? A crowd around a demented boy and a broken-hearted father. And Jesus said no, "I don't live in tabernacles. No sanctuary upon the mountain for me. There is where I go to seek and to save that which was lost." And Peter never learned what that meant until he himself had been lost and saved, and then he knew it and he lived upon it. He had to think the truth out.

Suffering for Men

Are you tabernacle Christians and nothing else? It seems to me sometimes that the note of Catholic humanity is more frequently found in many social organizations to-day than it is in the Church of Christ. I find that note struck in Socialism. I find that note struck in international labor. I find that note struck in science, with its great central conception of a common origin and of a shared destiny. Mazzini strikes that note, and Tolstoi strikes that note; but—alas! alas! it is rare and it is infrequent in the Church of Jesus Christ.

And I venture to go further. I say that the great sacrifices made for the brotherhood of man are oftener made to-day under the flag of politics than under the Cross of Jesus Christ. How many thousands upon thousands of suffering men and women have tramped the five thousand miles across Siberia to the mines as political exiles for the sake of Russia; year after year that sacrificial army of political martyrs have taken their lives in their hands and have made their sacrifice and have gone out to die at the mines, hoping that by their sacrifice liberty might at last come to Russia. And have you ever made a sacrifice for Jesus? Can you honestly say, as you look back through your life, you have ever done one really hard and difficult and sacrificial thing for Christ? And until you do you will never know what the joy of Christianity is. I would rather be marching across Siberia, carrying in my heart the hope of deliverance for my nation than I would sit at home lapped in luxury, feeding upon the life of the nation with the autocrat of all the Russias.

Now, do we feel like that about the kingdom of Jesus Christ? For that is how we ought to feel. When Jesus came to know the Samaritan he found the Samaritan had great virtues. When he came to know the Gentile he said of a Roman centurion: "Why, this man has faith such as is not found in Israel." And it was a woman who was a sinner who washed his feet with tears when Simon the Pharisee refused him the commonest courtesy to the guest—the basin of cold water. And it was a dying robber on the Cross that offered him the frankincense of his penitence and love, in a moment when disciple and friend had forgotten and forsaken him.

Christ proved as he came closer and yet closer to the common people how lovable they were. And, my friends, some of us have found that out, too. As I have already told some of you, one of the discoveries I have made in my own mission work in trying to touch the lowest of the population was this: How easy they were to be touched. There is more indifference to Christianity in the churches, than there is among the men of the street. It is here where the indifference is. Outside, and especially among the lowest, there is a gratitude for kindness, there is an instant response, which one does not often get under the sermon-hardened pew-holders of respectable churches. Go out and get close to the common people and you will find out what Christ observed, how teachable they are, how lovable they are, and how easy it is to save them.

The Rescue of the Fallen

And what has the education of pity taught? Would that I could speak upon it as I ought! It is the education of pity that has brought me here to-night. It was pity of the things I saw that broke me down and altered my life. Let me take you to a scene, for a moment, far from this beautiful country, to that crowded London of mine. There, in a narrow street, dark as the entrance to infernal regions, are two houses I know. In one house, each night, seventy lost women sleep; in the other, fifty, the homeless wanderers of the streets. Womanhood at its lowest! Can one do anything to save them? you ask. Why, yes; for from those two houses I have taken eight women, who are now reclaimed, one of them is teaching in a Sunday School to-day. I have learned to see them come into my church as I have preached, poor things, crouching behind a pillar yonder. I have had little, dirty scraps of paper sent up "Please sing, 'When I Survey the Wondrous Cross.'" I knew where they came from. The week before Christmas, when I got home, I went down to those two houses with my son and daughter, and spoke to every one of those women, and told them that on Christmas Day, at all events, they should be safe. On Christmas day I would feed every one of them; they should have their Christmas dinner, and the lodging-house keeper himself gave them their beds for nothing that night; so that on Christmas night, the night of the Saviour, there should be no crime under that roof.

The pity of it! and the world is full of things like that! And here we sit quiet; we live our respectable lives; we don't think of it, we don't want to think of it, some of us. We prefer shutting it all out, for pity is pain, it is a torture, it is an agony, but it is an education. And what some of these people want to-day is the education of a great pity, and the more respectable you are, the more God has blessed your life with money and comfort, the more need there is for you to have your heart pierced with pity, or it will grow hard with selfishness. The education of pity! That is how the things apply to us.

A Murderer's Reproach

But you say, "We don't need enlightenment upon these matters." That is so, you don't; but you need conviction. Theoretically, we all accept a great number of things, but what is the use of a theory unless you make an experiment? Well, isn't there a great reason? are there not many reasons, why we, if we believe in the theory of these things, should pass on to the experiment?

Let me suggest three or four reasons. The first lies in the demand of your own sincerity. The most ruinous of all habits is the habit of holding truths which we don't practice, for they soon cease to be truths. I wonder whether any of you ever heard a terrible saying of a great criminal, a wretched creature, burglar and murderer, called Charles Peace, who attained an infamous fame about a dozen years ago by his crimes. He was going to the scaffold, and the prison chaplain offered him what are called the consolations of religion, and the wretched man turned around upon him and said "Do you believe it? Do you believe it? If I believed that," said Charles Peace, "I would crawl across England on broken glass, on my hands and knees, to tell men it was true!" An extreme statement; yes, but isn't it a significant statement? Doesn't it come home to us when we say that these poor people are our sisters and our brothers? We sing hymns about it, we hear sermons about it, and we preach sermons about it. But if we do nothing, don't be surprised if the world turns around presently and says, your religion is all a sham; you are insincere. I say that our sincerity demands of us that we put our theory to experiment.

Seek the Wanderer

Another reason lies in the nature of the man himself who is lost. The lost man does not come home. He doesn't know how to come home. He can't come home, he doesn't know the way and he hasn't got the strength. He must be sought if he is to come home. When I slept once at St. Bernard's Hospice, I remember noticing as I drew near the hospice how the great cross upon the rock stood out against the stormy sky, the signal of redemption, and there was the hospice, with its thick walls amid the falling snows, and its door ready to be opened to the traveler. Ah, but that was not enough. The traveler can't always see the cross amid the driving snow-storm, and the traveler can't always get as far as the door, though he believes the door would be opened if he got there. And so, beside the cross and beside the hospice, there is something else. There are the dogs, trained and ready. There are the monks, watching and eager, and at the first cry of distress the dogs and the monks are out in the snow, seeking for that which is lost.

My friends, it isn't enough to build your hospice, your church, and say to the people, Come. Christ's word is not come. Christ's word is seek, seek. Go

THE CHURCH AS IT IS TO-DAY

REV. P. V. VAN BUSKIRK

THE FIRST MEETING-HOUSE (THE MOODY HOMESTEAD)

Founded in Dutch Colonial Days

BY W. E. WILLIS

ON Sunday, March 19, 1905, the congregation of the Dutch Reformed Church of the historic old town of Gravesend (now a part of Greater New York), will celebrate the completion of a religious work of two and a-half centuries.

The Church is one of the oldest in America. When New York was subordinate to the government of Holland, and Kieft was Governor-General of the colony, the sturdy old Dutchmen who had settled here felt the need of the Gospel, and accordingly made application to the home government to send them a preacher. The Classis of Holland, in 1655, in a letter to John Megapolensis, who had written on behalf of the settlers, promised to send them a "man of God" to preach to them.

After the receipt of the letter, Johann Polhemus, for many years a missionary in the West Indies, arrived. He preached his first sermon on March 18, 1655. There are no authentic records to show in what house it was preached, but it is a popular supposition among the descendants of the oldest settlers, that it was in the house of Lady Deborah Moody, a building later known as the Hick's homestead, which was built in 1644, and which is still standing in a fair state of preservation. For some years, preaching was continued each Sunday, in the houses or barns of different people, till a "Sessions House" was moved there from the town of Jamaica, about twelve miles distant. This house was a crude affair, in which court was held on week days, and religious services on the Sabbath, until 1714.

In 1714, an organization was effected by the following persons, most, if not all of whom were members of the Reformed Dutch Churches of the original villages:

Samuel Garretson, Cornelius Van Cleef, John Lake, John Simonson, Daniel Griggs, Stephen Coerten, Fernandus Van Sicklen, John Ryder, Nicholas Williamson, Thomas Stillwell, Benjamin Griggs, Barent Jansen, John Lucasse, William Williamson, Adam Michaelson, Samuel Pocling, Segar Garretson, Bernardus Ryder.

There were eighteen heads of families in all. In this organization, John Lake and John Simonson were chosen elders, and Samuel Garretson and Cornelius Van Cleef, deacons. The church edifice, the old "Sessions House," was not held by the corporation; but the title, having been taken by individuals, was held by them as tenants in common. At this time, the six united Dutch congregations—as the Churches of Brencklyn (Brooklyn), Bushwick, Jamaica, Amersford (Flatlands), Midwout (Flatbush) and New Utrecht were called—had only two ministers: Rev. Bernardus Freeman and Rev. Vincentius Antonides. By arrangement, each place had preaching every third Sunday. In 1715, a contract was signed by the elders of the Town of Gravesend, John Lake and John Simonson, and the elders of New Utrecht Town, Peter Cortelyou and Cornelius Van Brunt, whereby Gravesend was to have preaching on alternate Sundays with the New Utrecht Church, and the Lord's Supper was to be administered twice in the New Utrecht Church to once in the Gravesend Church. The contract also contained a clause whereby each church bound itself to pay share, and share alike, for "firewood and fires," and "tallow dips" for lighting. This contract existed till July 31, 1741, when the Revs. Freeman and Antonides retired, and religious services temporarily ceased.

In 1745, Bernardus Van Bryck, for many years teacher in the town school, without the sanction of Classis or Synod, was chosen "town preacher." In the interim (1741 to (1745), a young preacher recently graduated from college, Schoonmaker by name, was sent by the Synod of New Amsterdam (New York), to try and revive the lax religious sentiment. His visits were irregular; but gradually the religious fire became rekindled, and the people returned to the "Sessions House" for Sunday worship. A church was built and a preacher supplied by the Classis of Long Island until a permanent pastor was secured. In 1834 a new church was built, and under the ministry of Dominie Hanson, the congregation grew and flourished. In 1887, the present faithful and well-beloved pastor, Rev. Peter Vreeland Van Buskirk, succeeded him. The people decided to build a new and more commodious and beautiful church. On October 28, 1894, the present fine edifice was dedicated. It is built near the site of the old "Sessions House." On the present church-roll are many of the descendants of the original organizers, bearing the same names as their ancestors. While the congregation is not in any sense wealthy, the church is on a sound financial basis. It has a large Sunday School, and its Christian Endeavor Society, of about 150, is one of the wide-awake institutions of the church and infuses Christian sentiment in the young people of the neighborhood.

Despite its 250 years of service, this venerable church is still doing a healthy work for the Master. In fact it seems to speak the words of the Psalmist, "I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations: therefore shall the people praise thee, for ever and ever."

out and seek that which is lost. And then if you want a third reason, that reason was in the history of Christianity itself. I need go no further than the story of my own country. I look back and I see marching into Canterbury the first great company of missionary priests, carrying their great golden cross before them, and making the sweet English air sweeter yet with the hallelujahs of the Christ. Some one sought us. And I look back to your early records. I remember the name of such a man as Bishop Asbury and all those magnificent pioneer Methodists who pushed their way into the waste. Some one sought you. And as we have been sought and found, so it is now our turn to seek and to find. And I find as I look all through the story of Christianity that Christianity has never progressed except in those ages when the spirit of search has suddenly sprung up in men's hearts again, and instead of sitting still in the tabernacle they have come out and gone down the mountain slopes to the place where the world has lain stricken and wounded.

And then there is another reason more powerful still. It is this, that all sense of the reality of religion perishes when the passion for the lost dies down. You have to save in order to believe in saving. Is there a medical man here? No doubt there is. What would you say, sir, if after a whole year's practice, as you looked back over the story of it and counted the names of your patients, you found you had not saved a single case, but lost every one. Wouldn't your conclusion at once be a rooted distrust of the whole science of medicine? And so doubt in Christianity is always the fruit of the discontinuance of the propagandist spirit in Christianity. When men are getting healed; when we see the salvation of the lost; when we know by that which goes on in our own lives that the lost can be saved, then we believe in Christianity. And when the passion for the lost goes out of the Church no wonder you have coldness, disunion, and, last of all, apostacy and faithlessness.

And now, my brethren, God's providence has led me to see that these are the great truths which need restating at this moment for you and for me. Nay, more, not only do these truths need restating, but I venture to think that the time has now come when these truths are going to take possession once more of the Christian mind and conscience. We are at the end of a great many things. We are at the end of materialism as a philosophy, if not as a practice, for thinking men have given up materialism as a theory of the universe.

And you have a new conception of prayer given you by men of science. The object of prayer is not to desire God to do something for you, but to put yourself into submission to God, so that he may work through you. We are at the end of materialism. You can't live by it. America is not going to be able to live by it; no intelligent man will live by materialism. And you are at the end also of the theory that human salvation can be obtained by purely social means. We have tried it. Some good has been done, but it has not gone very deep.

And we have come to the end pretty nearly of our faith in culture as being able in itself to do all that is necessary for the redemption of mankind. It can do a great deal, no doubt, to help us. But culture can prove just as hostile to virtue as ignorance. And we might have known it long ago if we had paid any heed to history.

It is only a few months ago in my country everybody was discussing, and all the preachers were preaching, about the attacks upon Christianity made in a paper called the Clarion. And the railway news-stalls were laden with replies and counter-replies to these attacks on Christianity. And after that there came a discussion in the paper on "Do We Believe?" And that ran for two or three months, and all sorts of persons rushed into print to tell us why they did not believe, and all the while, quietly, down among the Welsh hills, a little group of colliers had found the spirit of the Lord, and, without leadership and without preaching and without organization, solely by the power of prayer, Pentecost had been brought back. And throughout those Welsh valleys to-day, thousands upon thousands know why they believe and they know that Christianity is true.

Now, my friends, do we really want a revival, or is it mere talk? Do we want it? You need it, you need it for your own sake. God knows you are cold enough, and that your religion is scarcely so much as skin deep. You need it for the nation's sake. There are troubles enough and difficulties enough in the conditions of life in this and in my own country to make a patriot pray, whether he be a Christian or not, that a new spirit of righteousness may be poured upon the people. And what we need we can have. We can have it now. It may begin here. It may seem quite unlikely to you, this may seem to be the last kind of place where the fire shall be kindled which shall go from peak to peak; nay, it shall go from shore to shore, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and yet it may be kindled here, if we are willing, in this day of God's power. God has been waiting a long time just for us to be ready. If we are willing to open our hearts to the spirit, to enter upon this work of the great evangel, feeling that nothing in the world is worth living for so much as to seek and to save that which is lost, to-day the baptism may begin, the wave may start, the fire may begin to run along the ground and kindle as it goes.

SWEDEN'S FAMINE BARRIER

was used to pay for carting the relief supplies from the railway station to remote sufferers who had no horse.

One of the bright sides of this famine is that it has been the means of giving an impulse in the right direction. Those who have suffered from it have now become deeply and heartily interested in the improvement of their little farms, and in agriculture and cattle-breeding, generally. The people have now learned the bitter truth that they will be defeated in their struggle with nature unless they use new and better methods, and take advantage of opportunities heretofore neglected, in the advice offered them by the agricultural experts sent through the country by the Provincial Agricultural Society.

The Famine Fund of Norrbotten amounts at present to about 300,000 kronors. It has grown by famine contributions coming in too late to be of use in the famine for which they were intended, and has also increased by accumulating interest. About two-thirds of it is invested in bonds and certificates of deposit. One-third of it has been used in granting loans to persons who are thereby given an opportunity of buying homes of their own. This year, about 130,000 kronors had to be taken out of the Famine Fund for relief to famine-stricken districts.

Of the 100,000 kronors donated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the Central Famine Relief Committee of Stockholm, Sweden, 75,000 kronors were allotted to Norrbotten, and this money, together with a few contributions from other private individuals (amounting in all to 41,401.49 kronors) was used, as will be seen by the following authentic account:

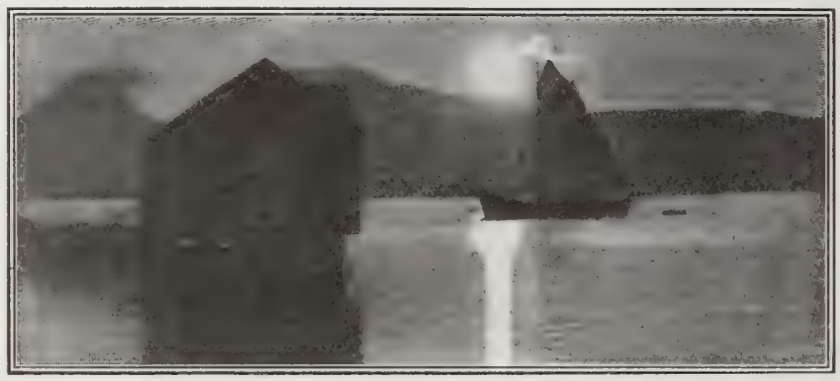
In this province of Norrbotten, Governor Bergstrom personally interested himself in distributing the money to the best advantage. He also hit upon the wise expedient of inducing many of the farmers, who were physically able, to make roads leading to the districts where the food supplies were to be carried, and thus hasten relief to the sufferers, for all supplies had to be sledged over the snows many miles before it could reach its destination. He arranged that this work of making the roads should be done by the farmers, with the idea of making them feel more independent in the fact of their having to accept the charity, and also with the idea of their earning some money, for they were paid for this labor. But owing to a report circulated in the American newspapers, to the effect that the money derived from the American people was being put to this use, scores of protests poured in from that country, declaring that the money was to be given outright and not to be loaned or earned.



THE "MIDNIGHT SUN" AT NORRBOTTEN

As none of the American contributions had been used for this purpose (Swedish money alone having been placed to this use), the protests caused Mr. Bergstrom much vexation. His most recent scheme for the good of these people is one that should impress all those interested in philanthropic problems as being a clever solution of the subject in hand. He has started a movement called "The Own Home Movement," and his plans are to gain control of a sufficiently large sum of money to devote to the use of the farmers who are without homes of their own, and who, with their families, are at present living in miserable hovels, or in the outhouses or barns of the other farmers for whom they and their families are working, and receiving as pay such lodgings as these and the most meagre food. With the money he collects, Mr. Bergstrom intends to make it possible for each of these wretched peasants to buy a small farm and house on credit, and to receive a small loan for the purchasing of farming implements, and a horse and cow. His theory is that he will thus be eliminating vagabondage from the provinces, and giving all who are ambitious enough to care for it the opportunity to make someth of themselves and to have a chance to succeed. He already interested many wealthy people of Sweden this venture, and even the Swedish parliament, so t it seems promising from the outlook of to-day.

During the time of the famine, money came in large sums. Through the efforts of Mr. Bell alo $85,000 was raised in Minnesota, and $45,000 in Kans from the Swedish colony there. Besides this, the Sven Amerikanska Posten collected and sent $14,000. Stockholm was not behind in generous contributions. number of the richest families of that city recalled vitations for balls, dinners and receptions, and devo the money to have been used for that purpose to sw ing the fund for the famine. The private donations Swedes were remarkable, especially from those of middle class.

The school children throughout Sw den sent 1,500 kronors, with which procure shoes and clothing for the sch children of Norrbotten. The Centra Committee, however, discovered the d tress in this respect to be so great, th it added 5,000 kronors more from own funds.

Governor Bergstrom travels throu the provinces at regular intervals, gether with several experts in agric ture, geology, chemistry, etc., and giv courses of lectures on subjects whi may be of use to the farmer. The f lowing letter will give to those who a interested in the work done for the poor children of the north, an insig into the methods and benefits of the schools. It is dated from Lulea, Swede

You want to know how we are getting alo in our industrial schools for poor and distressed children up here Norrbotten. . . I will therefore write you a few lines about the p gress of this branch of our relief work. Last fall, as you kno Governor Bergstrom, his wife and I organized the first industr school in this province here in Lulea. This school, or "Arbetsstuga as we call it, is now attended by forty children belonging to the m distressed families. These children are here instructed in vari kinds of handicraft and "sloyd," and, as a reward for their wo they receive a meal of plain, but nourishing food. By these ind trial schools we try to counteract the most fatal consequenc which poverty brings to the children, namely, insufficient a unwholesome food, and idleness, and begging.

Eight industrial schools, providing food and clothing for t poorest children, have been established in the following parish of the province of Norrbotten: Gellivare, Jockmock, Arvidsja Arjeploug, Korpilombolo, Tarendo, and Ofver Tornea. In each the eight schools there are on an average fifty children. He under the guidance of a preceptress especially educated a trained for this kind of work, the children are taught wood-sloy joinery, wood-carving, etc., shoe-making, brush-making, weavi and braiding of wood-fibre, etc. The girls receive special instr tion in sewing and weaving. Besides this practical instructio they are taught the common school branches.

We earnestly hope that these industrial schools may be perm nent, and we shall do our best to make them so. They will be happy reminder of the most severe famine-year which has v ited the Province of Norrbotten as far back as the present ge eration can remember. It is equally true that the noble gen osity of charitable people will bear fruit through all eternity.

AN UPTOWN NEW YORK MISSION

IN a neighborhood on the upper east side of New York, composed almost entirely of cheap lodging-houses and saloons, stands the Beacon Light Mis ion. Third Avenue, near 129th Street, has been called the Bowery of Harlem, and judging from appearances, and the testimonies of the mission workers who have labored in this vicinity, it deserves the name. The proximity of railroad yards and empty freight cars, is inducement enough to tempt the homeless and friendless men, who often find shelter from the biting cold of a winter's night, here and in the yards, where building materials are stored. A man who can secure an empty lime barrel for a bed-room by right of pre-emption, considers himself fortunate when he has not the price of a scarcely more comfortable resting-place in a cheap lodging-house. Under the great arch of the Harlem Bridge, these poverty-stricken wretches find shelter from the keen winds which chill their bodies through worn and ragged clothing.

Eleven years ago the Beacon Light Mission was opened, and many a despairing man has found salvation, and a kind, helping hand in the little mission hall. The workers have labored especially to bring intemperate men t Christ, but nearly all classes and many nationalities have been reached and blesse through these endeavors. Rev. S. P. Fairbanks, who now has charge of the Missio is a strong-hearted youn preacher, who works ea nestly, and with a dee sympathy for his unfortu nate fellow-men. Many r markable conversions ar said to have taken plac there. His assistants in th work are men who origina ly came to the meeting merely to get a cup of co fee or something to ea and who found there th Bread of Life. Many c this class have become sobe and decent, and have bee restored to their families.

AN EVENING GATHERING AT THE BEACON LIGHT MISSION

A crying need of the Mis sion is a building wher the men can be lodged an cared for temporarily. Mr Fairbanks believes that i such a building could b secured or built, the use fulness of the Beaco Light Mission would b greatly augmented, and i would be made a blessin to many whom it is impos sible, under present condi tions, to accommodate.

People who Influenced Washington

KENMORE HOUSE, HOME OF WASHINGTON'S SISTER

HOME OF WASHINGTON'S MOTHER, FREDERICKSBURG, VA.

STANDING as the greatest figure in our national history, Washington seems set apart from us, and from the people of his own time. We picture him only at the striking points of his career; rallying the panic-stricken troops of Braddock, after the disastrous defeat by the French and Indians; drawing his sword beneath the Elm at Cambridge, as he took command of the forces of the United Colonies; crossing the Delaware and attacking the Hessians at Trenton; cheering the starving troops at Valley Forge; and finally, as the conqueror of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

In our imagination, there stands that heroic figure, as drawn by the masterhand of Trumbull, a figure over six feet tall, dressed in buff and blue, beside a snow-white charger.

We are apt to forget that the greatness of his character was the result of normal growth; that it owed much to the influence of that quiet home, on the banks of the Rappahannock. His father dying when Washington was but a lad, his early training was entirely in the hands of his mother. The widow, then in her thirty-sixth year, undertook the education of her five children and the management of a large estate.

Oversight of the plantations developed in her a business ability unusual in a woman of her time. Accustomed to rule, she later in life refused to go and live with her daughter in Fredericksburg, but preferred to take a small house near, of which she could be the head. She was a stern disciplinarian, and the future general inherited from her the spirit of command. An overseer, it is related, once carried on some of the farming operations in a manner somewhat different than had been prescribed by his mistress; the rebuke he received prevented any re-occurrence of independent action on his part.

She was a woman of rare refinement, too, frugal and of a strongly religious disposition, and never failed to impress all who met her with her dignity and force of character. A certain part of each day she devoted to prayer, and here, can we not see, as a reflection of that early training, the figure of Washington kneeling in the snow, in the woods near Valley Forge?

Next to the influence of Washington's mother, must be ranked that of his half-brother, Lawrence Washington, and his friend, Lord Fairfax, of Greenway Court. Lawrence took a paternal interest in Washington's career, and together with Fairfax, encouraged his desire for a military life. Lawrence had distinguished himself in the expedition, under the joint command of Admiral Vernon and General Wentworth, against the Spanish in New Grenada.

He procured a commission for George in the British navy, but fortunately for the destinies of the American colonies, Washington's mother interfered at the last moment and prevented his sailing, much to the disappointment of the elder brother. It was through his influence that George later received a commission from the governor of Virginia, to drill the inhabitants on the western frontier of the colony; and put them in a posture of defence, to repel the incursions of the French and Indians. George was made his brother's heir, and at his death received the estate of Mt. Vernon. Under his ownership, the place was laid out on the plan of an English country seat, and the mansion witnessed a constant round of house parties and receptions, all in the lavish style for which Virginia was famous.

Lord Fairfax followed with eager interest every upward step made by the young officer; but being an ardent royalist, the Revolution almost broke his heart. When he heard that the King's forces had at last been overcome by his former protege, he took to his bed; and died a few days later.

At the outbreak of the Revolution, Washington persuaded his mother to move into a house she owned on Charles Street, in Fredericksburg. This house has been somewhat altered. Part of the roof has been raised and a modern porch added. The garden in which she had the famous meeting with the Marquis de Lafayette, is now well covered with buildings. It was here that Washington came to see his mother after the capture of Cornwallis. She inquired anxiously after her son's health, but, as far as the record shows, never a word did she say in regard to his victory.

Between Washington and his sprightly sister Elizabeth, there existed a strong bond of comradeship. She was the wife of Col. Fielding Lewis, who built for her the mansion called Kenmore House. No cost was spared in its construction, and Italian artists were brought over to paint the frescoes that adorn its walls. The artists having exhausted their designs, Betty wrote to George, asking him to suggest something. He devised one illustrating the ancient fable of the fox and the crow. This was painted on the parlor mantel. The house still stands, its glories dimmed by years, but yet an imposing relic of the stately age gone by.

Mrs. Lewis used to delight in suddenly appearing to the guests at Kenmore, in Washington's long military cloak and cocked hat. At first glance they would almost invariably take her for her illustrious brother, for her resemblance to Washington was most striking. Her son at one time commanded Washington's Life Guards, which played no small part in several battles of the Revolution.

As we acknowledge the debt we owe to Washington, let us not forget that which we owe to these four people, who in his early life helped to mould his character, so that he was, in the words of the French historian Jouault, "a man who was the guide of his country without wishing to become its master."

Washington

FEBRUARY has the proud distinction in this country of celebrating the birthdays of two of our greatest men, Lincoln and Washington. Each of these great souls was ushered into a stormy world, in the stormy month when winter gives up the ghost, and retires to make room for spring.

It is a great honor to have one's day of birth celebrated by uncounted thousands in remote generations. We sometimes feel that the flames of patriotic ardor need fanning in this material age; that people are so set upon money-making and getting on, that they have little time or thought for the plain living and high thinking of other days. Yet, were George Washington to come back to this wonderful country, which was so small a country in the day when he stamped upon it his own sterling virtues of courage, honor and integrity, he would not have reason wholly to be ashamed of it. The bells that ring, the flags that flutter, the drums that beat, on Washington's birthday, keep alive in the heart of the nation traditions of heroism. Washington came of sturdy ancestry. He was taught virtue and obedience in a plain home, under the rule of a mother who was simple, loving and God-fearing. His father dying when the boy was very young, he was a good specimen of the sort of manhood that may be developed under the fostering care of a wise mother.

It is to be feared that the chief reason why our schoolboys prize the natal days of great men, is that they give them a chance for a rollicking holiday; yet as a holiday is a happy event, either in child-life or that of a care-worn man, it is not unlikely that Washington himself would approve of it, could he be consulted.

The country is still young. Hundreds of years hence, when it has reached a prime only foreshadowed now, let us hope it will still keep Washington's birthday. Do we remember as we ought, that Washington was a gentleman in the best sense of that good old word; that he was free from self-seeking, and lived not for himself, but for the nation, then in the throes of its birth struggle, and that he was a man of incorruptible honesty, and that he was a man of prayer? In some of the darkest crises of the Revolution, that long and exhausting conflict which amazes us as we read of it to-day, the Commander-in-chief of the American forces was wont to withdraw from every one, and pour out his soul in prayer to Almighty God.

Our victorious general, our first President, our magnificent statesman, whose name has never grown dim, we may still call him, "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

Plans for Revival in New York

THE plans formed for an evangelistic campaign in New York are exceedingly promising. A committee of one hundred clergymen has been organized to conduct it. The essential unity of the Christian denominations is shown by the fact that every branch of the Church is represented on that committee. All are agreed on the need of a revival, and on the kind of remedy that will be effectual in improving present conditions. That the city is in a deplorable state there can be no question in the mind of any observant citizen. A wave of crime seems to have overwhelmed it. Vice and luxury, and disregard of God's laws, are to be seen everywhere. Patriots who consider the condition from a secular standpoint, are concerned about it, and are advocating reforms in legislation, and in the enforcement of the laws. The clergymen have a clearer idea of the true remedy. If the spiritual and moral tone of the people is raised, and men are converted to Christ, there will be a purifying and a cleansing that nothing else could accomplish.

We trust that before the meetings in Madison Square Garden and Carnegie Hall are commenced, and the experienced evangelists who are to take part in them are called, there will be in every church in the city a season of earnest prayer. The arrangements, so far as they have been made, are excellent. The ministers who will speak are earnest, eloquent, consecrated men, But we must not forget that it is not by might nor by power that a revival can come, but by the Spirit of the Lord. Dependence on God must be entire and unreserved, otherwise he will show us that our best efforts are powerless. Revivals that are organized and planned seldom materialize. Successful revivals in the past have usually started in some quiet, unostentatious way and gradually spread from church to church. But the Spirit of God is not bound. It may be that the methods of the past need to be changed, and that a movement on the scale now planned is the best method at this time of reaching the masses. But the essential element is the Spirit.

The work may be done by the many or by the few, but only as the Holy Spirit touches the hearts of men, can success come. There should be earnest, importunate, unceasing prayer for that Almighty Power. Every Christian in the city ought to unite in that prayer. There should be heart-searching, also. God will not hear prayer that is not accompanied by sincerity of life. The Church itself is partly at fault for the lowered religious life of the city. There ought to be a turning to God on the part of Christians, an impassioned desire for a full salvation and a closer walk with God. Then prayer will be effectual and God will give an answer of peace.

Bible Reading

WE who dwell in this enlightened land too often neglect our Bibles. Away over the sea there is a Chinese Christian, converted since he grew to manhood, who has already read the whole Bible through twice, and the New Testament three times. On the ridge-pole of his house this man has put the inscription "Christ is here." Well would it be for us if the words "Christ is here" were so written in our hearts that they might be fittingly put over the door of our homes. There are many church members here in America who have not done what this Chinese convert has, in his daily study of the Word of Life.

A few verses hurriedly read at night, part of a chapter skimmed over in the morning, are not enough for the sustenance of robust Christian men and women. At least we should read our Bibles as earnestly and as diligently as we read the daily papers. The profit of reading the Bible through in course, is very great. It gives us the freedom of a great library, the stamp of Christian intelligence.

The Northland's Gratitude

THAT the great famine of 1902 has taught the government and people of Sweden a valuable lesson, by which other nations may also profit, is made clear in the very interesting letter on the subject, which appears in another part of this issue.

When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, during the grievous suffering in that year, raised a relief fund which was distributed among the famishing peasants of Finland and Sweden, the bleak province of Norrbotten—one of the loneliest sections of King Oscar's domain—received 75,000 of the 100,000 kronors apportioned to the Swedish sufferers. This sum, equal to about $30,000 in American money, was wisely administered by the Governer of the province, who not only fed the starving, but gave employment to all who were capable of working. After the acute stage had passed, the Governor, like Joseph of old, set about making provision against its recurrence, by accumulating, with the aid of the farmers and peasants themselves, a fund to be used for similar emergencies in the future. As a result of his energetic efforts, this permanent relief fund now amounts to a considerable sum, and the social and economic condition of the population in the rural districts is greatly improved. Vagabondage and pauperism are rapidly being eliminated, and active industry is stimulated to a degree heretofore unknown. Industrial schools for children have been established, and the rising generation, in Norrbotten at least, promises to be far more capable of self-support under adverse conditions than any of its predecessors.

To our friends and readers, whose gifts and prayers were so largely instrumental in arresting the famine in the Northland, the grateful acknowledgments of the officials and people, repeated at this late date, must bring a feeling of sincere thankfulness for being privileged to carry on a work productive of such beneficent results. But, pleasing though such assurance are, far more grateful is the reflection that our readers did what they could, and that their humble labors for the Master's sake have been abundantly acknowledged.

A Mighty Power for Good

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON THE WORK OF THE BOWERY MISSION

More Bowery Missions Needed

If the thought of the local Methodist ministers, as expressed at a meeting in the lecture room of the Central Y. M. C. A. this morning, crystallizes into action, Brooklyn will soon have an enterprise patterned after the famous Bowery Mission, in Manhattan. The Methodist pastors are agreed that this borough needs such a rescue work badly. The idea was suggested by Rev. Alfred Hodgetts, at the monthly session of Brooklyn and Long Island preachers' meeting. He dwelt on the need of some enterprise that would reach the men who are not reached by the churches, and one that would relate the converts to some church after saving them. This, he thought, could best be accomplished by a mission run by the Methodists as a denominational work. He told of seeing 500 men in the Bowery Mission last Saturday night, and how fifty told of being lifted from lives of misery and idleness. Mr. Hodgetts said he would guarantee that 300 men a night would attend such services in this borough.—Brooklyn, N. Y., Standard.

Work Found for the Unemployed

Superintendent Hallimond, of the Bowery Mission, to-day announced the result of the first month's work of the Free Labor Bureau, established to provide for the thousands of homeless men now in this city. During January, places within fifty miles of the city were found for 110 men, and applications for 500 more seekers after work were received.—N. Y. Evening Mail.

Idleness an Incentive to Crime

From estimates made at the Bowery Mission and the Municipal Lodging-House, the number of the destitute unemployed in New York City at the present time, will exceed 75,000, if indeed, it will not reach 100,000. Between this fact and the singular predominance of crime, just at present, direct connection is traced by the agents working to alleviate the existing distress. It may also have an important bearing on such questions as that of free breakfasts for needy school children. The great majority of the unemployed, too, are said to be decent men—comparatively young men from the country districts—who have been attracted to the city by exaggerated reports of opportunities for work. The Bowery Mission gives a breakfast of coffee and rolls to a thousand men every morning at one o'clock, and it was in this bread line that he first realized the number of decent young men in actual want and suffering. Mr. Hallimond questioned them, obtained each man's story, and found that invariably they did not belong in New York, they were sick and tired of it, and wanted to get out of the city. The problem to him was, how to set them at work in the country? And so he evolved his Free Labor Bureau, offering good reliable help to farmers, and the success he has met has been remarkable.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The "Bread Line" and the Homeless

The best of the "Bread Lines" are Fleishmann's, at Tenth Street, and Dr. Louis Klopsch's, at the Bowery Mission. At the latter, every morning at one oclock, one thousand homeless men are given a breakfast of coffee and rolls. The line usually extends from the Mission at 55 Bowery, around the block through Canal, Crystie, and Bayard Streets, and sometimes down along the Bowery, quite a distance toward Chatham Square. One night by actual count there were 1,683 men on the line. Over one hundred gallons of coffee, and from 1,000 to 1,500 rolls are consumed every morning. There is not the slightest doubt that many a homeless man is really benefited by this work.—Public Opinion.

Among the Workers

—THE TUESDAY HOLINESS MEETING, now being held at Dr. Palmer's every Tuesday at 2:30 P. M., was organized about seventy years ago, by Mrs. Sarah A. Lankford, sister of Mrs. Phœbe Palmer. After the death of Mrs. Lankford, Rev. A. C. Morehouse was elected as her successor. Since his death, in July, 1903, several ministers of New York City have been connected with the leadership. These meetings are interdenominational, and are attended by missionaries, ministers and laymen from various parts of the world. The meetings are held at Dr. Palmer's residence, No. 235 East Eighteenth Street, New York City.

Revolt in Argentina

SEVERAL States of the Argentina Republic were convulsed, early this month, by a rising which appeared at the outset to be widespread and formidable. There appears reason to believe that it was premature, for the government was able to suppress it before the insurgents could unite. In the vicinity of Buenos Ayres, several police posts were attacked by parties of thirty men at each place, but the police, though temporarily driven out, recaptured their stations. The army had been affected by discontent, and two regiments mutinied and marched on the capital. They were, however, met by troops loyal to President Quintana and were disarmed. At Mendoza, the capital of the Province of that name, the leaders of the revolt obtained a signal success. Two regiments of the army joined in the outbreak. At Cordoba, also, the military joined the insurgents and were proceeding to capture the arsenal at Ria Cuarto, when they were met by Major Matoso with a band of loyal troops, and were driven back. Later news shows that though the insurgents at Mendoza fortified their position and made a stubborn fight, they were ultimately driven out by the loyal troops and were obliged to take refuge in the hills. They had looted the local bank and carried off $500,000 to their hiding place. At Bahia Bianca, Santa Fe, Villa Maria, and in other sections, there were risings, but they were promptly suppressed. The government has forbidden newspaper comment on the outbreak, and there is an evident attempt to prevent the facts becoming known. How serious it must have been, is proved by the fact that President Quintana has declared a state of siege throughout the country. The revolt might easily have become a revolution but for the loyalty of the army.

It is on this feature that the insurgents appear to have been misled. The fact that a few regiments sympathized with the movement, may have led them to believe that the whole army was disloyal. The prisoners that have been taken are to be dealt with severely. Of the causes of the revolt and the grievances it was intended to remove, no account has as yet been allowed to appear. Sufficient, however, is known of the conditions in the Republic to give some idea. If the government desires to prevent such outbreaks in the future, it should see to it that its officers are such men as fulfil the Biblical demands:

Let the fear of the Lord be upon you; take heed and do it; for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts (II. Chron. 19: 7).

A Search for Treasure

Our Minister at Panama reports the arrival there of an expedition from Costa Rica, which has been searching for buried treasure. It has suffered an accident, which compelled the abandonment of the search. The expedition was under the charge of Earl Fitzwilliam, who, with a retired Admiral of the British Navy, applied to the government of Costa Rica for permission to explore Cocos Island for money and valuables, said to have been buried there by pirates. Permission was given, and the expedition commenced the search. They used dynamite at various places. In one instance they exploded a heavy charge at the base of a high, shelving cliff. While the party was examining the result of the explosion, the upper portion of the cliff, covered with great boulders and loosened by the discharge, gave way and fell upon the men, burying twenty of them. Four were taken out seriously injured, and none escaped unhurt. The wounded were conveyed through the water, breast high, to boats, and then to the ship, which at once proceeded to Panama. The search is abandoned for this time. It will probably be resumed either by its leaders or some other persons. The mere chance of finding treasure causes men to brave any kind of danger. There are many who are not deterred even by peril to their souls.

They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction (I. Timothy 6: 9).

Solar Phenomena

Disturbances of a violence it is not possible to conceive are taking place, say astronomers, in the sun. They are being watched with intense interest here and in Europe. Prof. Brashear of Allegheny, is the latest to describe the remarkable phenomena. He says: "The great spot has changed marvelously in the last two days. The various nuclei seem to have coalesced into three of quite large size. The great tongue of flame reaching out from the eastern side of the central spot has stretched across the entire central area. The whole spot is now exceeding beautiful, one of the grandest I ever witnessed. The smaller spot, which appeared on the western edge a few days ago, has broken up into three spots of large dimensions. Two other spots have appeared on the extreme western limb. It appears that the electrical effect upon the earth from the sun-spots is closely associated with faculæ, which border the spot or are mixed up in it. They indicate the violent explosions that have sent the gases thousands of miles high, until they reach a temperature sufficiently cool to solidify them, when they fall back into the sun again." There have been many theories advanced as to the cause of these phenomena, but none that is wholly satisfactory. There is an additional incentive to study them in the fact, that the appearance of sun-spots is usually accompanied by phenomenal weather on the earth, but why a commotion on a body so many millions of miles away, should affect us is a mystery. Happily for us we are not left to solve the spiritual mysteries of the heavens. The effect on us of the Sun of Righteousness is revealed to us.

To you that fear my name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings (Mal. 4: 2).

KING OSCAR OF SWEDEN

THE PLAZA VICTORIA, BUENOS AYRES

THE PLACE OF THE CONSTITUTION, BUENOS AYRES

King Oscar in Retirement

The able and accomplished King of Sweden and Norway is again obliged to retire temporarily from the duties of State. It appears that he is suffering from a malady that unfits him for the performance of the royal functions. At a recent sitting of his council he announced the necessity for rest, and handed the reigns of government to his eldest son, Prince Gustaf, until further notice. This is the second time he has had to resort to this arrangement. Six years ago he started on a tour of Europe, leaving Prince Gustaf in charge. His stay in Paris, London, and other capitals, had the effect of restoring his health, and in two years he was again able to resume his duties. He is now seventy-six years of age, so that the recurrence of his illness is more serious than before, but it is hoped that rest and change of scene will again prove effectual remedies. The king is a scholar, a scientist and a composer. His son is forty-seven years old, and is said to have inherited his father's ability. He is the natural heir to the throne, and he is thus gaining experience in the duties which will ultimately fall to his lot. That he may succeed in performing them as ably as his father has done we may hope for his own sake as well as that of his people.

The throne shall be established in kindness, and one shall sit thereon in truth, judging and seeking judgment, swift to do righteousness (Isa. 16: 5).

BRIEF NOTES

The Band of Hope Union now numbers over three million members. Interest in it has lately revived to a remarkable degree.

A South African millionaire has sent a check for $5,000 to the Salvation Army.

The superintendent of the Sunday School connected with the church of which "Ian Maclaren" is pastor, has been elected Lord Mayor of Liverpool.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie has refused to have anything to do with improvements in Pittsburgh, which would bring him into even remote connection with the liquor traffic.

The last ministerial survivor of the disruption of the Scottish Church under Chalmers in 1843, died last week, at the age of ninety nine. His name was James Yuill.

Evangelist E. P. Hammond is now making his fifth tour of Nebraska. His most earnest and efficient helpers are men and women, who, years ago, were converted under his preaching.

Major George W. Hilton has been conducting evangelistic services at Danville, Ky. All the churches of the city have united in the movement. Mr. G. C. Tullar assisted in the work and had charge of the musical exercises. The Danville News devoted an entire issue to reporting the revival.

On another page will be found one of the first sermons delivered in the course of the evangelistic tour by Rev. W. J. Dawson of London, who is announced in this journal last week, has begun his labors in New England. We are indebted to the courtesy of the Boston Herald for permission to present it to our readers.

More than 30,000 converts have formally joined the churches and chapels of South Wales during the revival.

While the Russian warships were passing through the Suez Canal their crews purchased 700 copies of Scriptures in Russian during one day and night from Bible colporteurs stationed on board at Port Said.

The Bible Society's distribution of Japanese Scriptures to the Mikado's troops between January 1 and October 31 1904 amounted to 216,171 copies. There are 56,000 wounded soldiers at present in Japan, and the demand for grants of Scriptures for them increases.

Shall We Know Our Friends in Heaven?

No Question has more frequently been on the Lips of the Children of Men, especially those who have laid away the Dearest Treasures of their Hearts, than the one which heads this page. Dr. Madison C. Peters, the Eminent New York Divine, whose Writings and Utterances have made him Internationally Famous, undertakes to Answer this Query in his Magnificent Work, entitled,

THE GREAT HEREAFTER

Or Glimpses of the Coming World

THIS Masterpiece of Art, Thought and Literature, contains a Vast Collection of Golden Gems from the greatest Historians, Philosophers, Preachers, Poets, Sages, Scientists and Statesmen of all Ages and Nationalities on every phase of the Future Life.

Four Hundred Authors are represented in this Beautiful Book, which is illumined by Forty Superb Illustrations made from drawings by World-renowned Artists, whose Pictures grace the most Famous Galleries of Europe.

CONTENTS of THIS WONDERFUL WORK

In the limited space at our disposal, it is impossible to give more than the Briefest Glimpse of the Splendor of these Scintillating Gems, but in this volume, Faith, Hope, and Love, find Reinforcement such as can elsewhere be found only in God's Holy Word.

Among the Subjects Carefully Treated in this Exceptionally Attractive Volume may be found: "The Immortality of the Soul," "The Soul's Yearning for Perfection," "The Prophecy of Its Immortality," "The Soul's Superiority to Decay," "Death Another Form of Birth," "We Shall Live Forever," "The Poet's Immortality," "The Old Testament on Immortality," "The Teachings of the Talmud," Good Things from Good Preachers," "Immortality of the Seasons," "Our Blessed Dead," "Our Children in Heaven," "Dying Testimonies," "The State of the Soul Between Death and the Resurrection," "Degrees in Glory," "What is Heaven," "The Employments of Heaven," "Manifold Services," "Eternal Progression," "False Views Concerning Occupations in Heaven Corrected," "Shall We See and Know Our Friends in Heaven?" "Friendships Perpetuated," "Memory Continued," "Heavenly Recognition Among the Poets," "Sunshine for the Sorrowing," "The Sorrowless Land."

From the Host of Testimonials to the Value of this Great Work We Cull the Following:

From THEODORE ROOSEVELT, President of the United States:

"I shall read THE GREAT HEREAFTER with deep interest. I have looked over it enough to be able to tell something of its value, and it has to me the added value of knowing the life, and the strife after right of the man who wrote it."

From Ex-President GROVER CLEVELAND:

"The Great Hereafter will not only have a place in my library, but will often be found in my hands, as a source of reinforcement of faith, exceedingly opportune in these days of loose thinking and careless teaching."

From Recorder JOHN W. GOFF:

"A casket of beautiful gems is The Great Hereafter. Dr. Peters must have devoted an enormous amount of work upon it. Mrs. Goff has gone over it from cover to cover, and she is delighted with it."

From JAS. R. DAY, D. D., Chancellor of Syracuse University:

"The Great Hereafter is a combination of profoundly valuable things upon a subject of the deepest possible interest to men. It will be helpful to thousands of hearts that are deeply anxious about these great matters of another life."

From the "N. Y. OBSERVER:"

"Individuals who have lost friends can never be satisfied with commonplace answers to their inquiries concerning their state and employments, and all men knowing their immortality, would fain penetrate into the future. This book sets forth the world-wide belief in the immortality of the soul, the proofs of it derived from all sources, and all that can be gathered respecting the state of the dead, and the world beyond the tomb."

From the "HOME JOURNAL," New York:

"For the dark chambers of bereaved hearts there are not only rays, but full beams of blessed sunlight, and the book from cover to cover brings peace, comfort and joy to the soul."

From the "CITIZEN," Boston, Mass.:

"The Great Hereafter will be an ideal holiday or birthday book for everyone who has lost a friend or who is interested in the world to come. There is no book now in existence so admirably adapted to the purpose for which this was prepared."

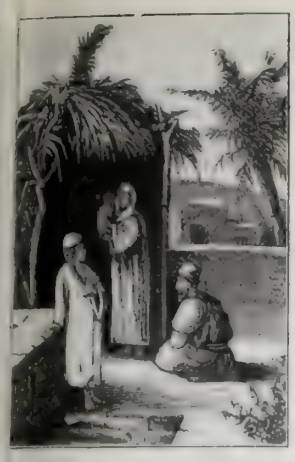
The Overflowing Life

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*



BOOTHS AT THE FEAST

THE ancient Jews had a Thanksgiving which lasted, not one day, but eight. They did not depend on the proclamation of any ruler to fix the time for it, for God had proclaimed once for all: "The fifteenth day of this seventh month shall be the feast of Tabernacles for seven days unto the Lord." And the eighth day was appointed as a day of holy convocation for worship in the Temple at Jerusalem, as was also the first day of the Feast (Lev. 23: 34-43).

People came in happy throngs from their distant homes in all parts of the land, to attend this Feast of Tabernacles. While in the city, they dwelt in bowers of leaves which they fashioned with their own hands. Even residents and householders in Jerusalem also dwelt in bowers which they erected on their housetops. Happy were those people who could secure places in the courts of the Temple to set up their booths. These booths were symbolical of the tents in which their fathers dwelt when they were on their journey from Egypt to Canaan, the land of promise. And so this ancestral debt of gratitude was added to the joy of harvest home. The streets of Jerusalem were filled with processions of happy people who waved branches of leaves, willow, myrtle, and palm in one hand, while in the other they carried Paradise apples, singing as they went to the praise of God, their Deliverer, and the Giver of the harvest.

"Where is he?" the people are asking, meaning Jesus. And he is discussed in their leafy bowers. Many words of praise are spoken of Jesus by those who have had friends healed by him, or who have been healed themselves. And others are unkind in their remarks. The days of the Feast—one, two, three days have passed, and he does not appear. But on the fourth day he is discovered sitting on the steps that lead out of the Court of Israel. A throng of people is gathered about him, listening to his teaching. But all do not listen with the same spirit. Some are angry, and hasten to inform the elders of the Jews that he is leading the people astray by false teaching. The Sanhedrin, the Court of the Jews, is hardly more than a stone's throw from where Jesus sits. The chief priests and members of the Sanhedrin send officers to bring Jesus to them. But they do not venture to lay hold on him, because they see he is held in favor by many of the people, and they are mystified by his declaration that he will soon go where they cannot follow him, even to the place from whence he came.

It is the eighth and last day of the Feast. Jesus is with the people in the Court of Israel, near the great altar of burnt offerings, but he does not presume to step over the line which separates the Court of Israel from the Court of the Priests. The altar is decorated with leaves. The people stand in rows singing and waving their bunches of leaves. A joyous procession is advancing, headed by a priest bearing a golden pitcher filled with water from the pool of Siloam. The people make room for the procession to pass. The priest pours the water into a silver basin at the side of the altar, and the people burst forth into singing the great Hallel with such gladness that the Jews have a saying of this occasion that "they who have not shared this joy of drawing water does not know what joy means."

The singing is ended and a solemn hush falls upon the multitude. The voice of Jesus rings out, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, from within him shall flow rivers of living water." Some who hear him rejoice; others are startled and know not what to think; others are angry at such an interpretation of the beautiful service of drawing water. The Sanhedrists send for Jesus to be brought to them forthwith, but no man dares to lay hands on him because of the divine dignity which is in his personality. They discuss him in the Sanhedrin, and propose that he shall forthwith be condemned to die. Nicodemus challenges them for giving judgment without having seen and heard Jesus themselves. And so the Sanhedrin disbands without action.

"IF ANY MAN THIRST, LET HIM COME UNTO ME AND DRINK"

This lesson has a message to both the unsaved and the saved, in that Christ offers to give the sinner the water of life, and to give it to the saint more abundantly.

I. The Imparted Life. In this lesson Christianity is presented, not as "the imitation of Christ," but as the impartation of Christ, not as a reservoir, but a spring within us. No book written by a Roman Catholic is placed by so many Protestants beside their Bibles, as The Imitation of Christ, by Thomas a Kempis, a monk. It has many sweet meditations, and if it be taken as a "second reader," by those who have first realized the impartation of Christ, it may be of service, though a monk who had retreated from the battle of life could not do justice to the courageous, manly side of Christ, but only to his meekness. "What would Jesus do?" is not the first question to ask at the portals of a Christian life, but what can Jesus make me to be. The first and essential thing is to get our hearts right by opening them to receive "the mind of Christ." "For every man that needs to be enlightened, ten need to be awakened." Then as spontaneously as water flows from a spring without pumping, joyous thoughts, right words and kind deeds will flow out of our lives in a ceaseless stream of blessing.

And from his love's exhaustless spring
Joys like a river come,
To make the deserts bloom and sing
O'er which we travel home.

What a fitting symbol is water, in its satisfying, cleansing, empowering qualities of the spirit of Christ, as it has fallen out of heaven into the hearts of men to become fountains of joy and purity and power for the Christian individual, the Christian home, the Christian school, the Christian state! How many deserts of sorrow it has turned to joy! How many foul sins it has washed away! How many it has equipped with power for good!

The ocean fitly symbolizes the boundless, world-wide supply of the Spirit of Christ, whose healing waters wait to bear or bathe any soul that will come.

There's a wideness in God's mercy like the wideness of the sea.

Here, again, the difference between being loaded with forms or immersed in Christ is seen, for while we could not bear a barrel of water on our heads, we can bear an ocean of it when we are in it.

How the cleansing, strengthening ocean waves bear us up when we trust them and rest upon them, but swallow us up if we doubt and struggle!

By faith I plunge me in this sea.
Here is my hope, my joy, my rest.

The river is also a beautiful picture of the spirit of Christ in the individual and the nation. "Everything shall live whithersoever the river runneth." Far across the prairie you can trace the river's course by the taller trees and the greener grass that are seen wherever its waters flow. And what sweeter picture of peaceful strength than a deep river, flowing quietly but resistlessly, turning a thousand wheels of industry as it flows on to the far-off sea.

But in this lesson Jesus pictures the Christian life as an exhaustless eternal spring opened in a human soul by the inflowing of his spirit. It is from the springs that the rivers and even the ocean receive their supply, and so the beginning of the Christian Church and the Christian State must be individual Christian souls. Near a fort, whose beleaguered garrison were without water, and must therefore have surrendered ere long, a cannon-ball of the enemy fell and opened a spring that saved them. So not infrequently some loss of friends or fortune is the tragic occasion of opening the spring of true life in a human soul, beleaguered with sin and dying of thirst.

"Thirst," in this lesson, means sorrow for sin and a desire to put satisfying life in its place. "What is repentance?" asked a Sunday School superintendent, and a little girl wisely answered, "It is being sorry enough to quit." It is thought that the before-described ceremony of bearing a golden pitcher of water from the Pool of Siloam, at the foot of Mount Zion, to the Temple altar during the Feast of Tabernacles, was a memorial of the smitten rock where the Israelites slaked their thirst in the desert. This takes us back to the Crucified as the source of that life that flows with pardon and peace into a penitent soul, and sends him forth with songs of joy upon his way.

The story is told of a Western farmer who was startled to find, after a storm, that the lightning had struck the cistern in his cellar, and emptied it of water. But a gurgling sound revealed the fact that the same stroke of lightning had split a rock, and opened the way to a hidden flowing stream. So, in beginning a Christian life, the pleasures we give up are but a cistern, while we win a river of unceasing joy, the joy of God's approval and a clean conscience, the joy of being and doing what God wills.

II. The Overflowing Life. When Jesus pictures a Christian life as an overflowing spring: "He that believeth on me, from within him shall flow rivers of living water," it is to many only a sad contrast with the shallow, parched life they are living, which is more like a wheezy pump than a river's spring. "I am come," said Jesus, "that ye may have life, and that ye may have it more abundantly." There are few privileges in life so inspiring as to meet a man of abundant life who talks, acts, lives without effort, as a bird overflows in joyous song and easy flight.

There are always a few rare natures who escape the decay which despoils the bloom of life, and carry with them into noon and evening the freshness and splendor of the morning. These are, by virtue of this quality, our guides and inspirers; they continually renew for us, and in us, the early vision, the pristine beauty of living. They show us again the loveliness we once saw in the flower, the glory we once saw in the sky, the dignity and nobility which life wore for us before care and selfishness had impaired our finer perceptions. The joy which such natures preserve for themselves and others, the power of impulse toward high and noble living which they continually generate, do not belong by nature to the few; they are universal gifts, within the reach of all who will put out a hand to take them.

'Tis heaven alone that is given away,
'Tis only God may be had for the asking.

Ruskin, and others, have noted that the common quality, amid many varieties in the world's leaders, is the retention of the freshness and feeling of childhood in the years of maturity. A foreign critic has said that the double quality of American art and literature is that it is "both fresh and mature." The fullest embodiment of this combination in all the ages, is in him whom John saw with head and hairs as white as wool with the maturity of eternal years, while his eyes were as a flame of fire, and his voice like the sound of many waters, and his feet like fine brass, as if burned in a furnace, all picturing the overflowing enthusiasm of eternal youth.

No man can so retain his enthusiasm who has not faith, and hope, and love; those springs of life that only a Christ within can give. No frost of age or misfortune can freeze up such a fountain. On the coldest day of a New England winter, the writer strolled into a graveyard, and suddenly came upon the fountain whose spray had formed a crystal monument of ice; but no chill could still the stream that rose into the air, cutting its way triumphantly through the ice, that now and then for a moment overtopping it, in all this a beautiful embodiment of the Spirit of Christ in a man beset with chilling troubles, bereavements, losses, misunderstandings, springing up, above all, into everlasting life.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

P. Q. Will you give a short account of the Panama Canal Treaty? How much was paid to Panama, and how much to France? Did Colombia receive anything?

The treaty between Panama and the United States was ratified by the United States Senate, February 23, 1904. By its provisions, Panama ceded to the United States, in perpetuity the "Use, occupation, control, and protection of the zone of land and land under water, for the construction, maintenance, operation and protection of the said canal, of the width of ten miles, extending to the distance of five miles on each side of the centre line of the route of the canal to be constructed." The Republic of Panama received $10,000,000. France, as a Government, received nothing. The Panama Canal Company, practically a French corporation, which started the old canal, was paid $40,000,000 for work done and for machinery. Colombia received nothing, as her sovereignty over Panama had ceased before the opening of negotiations.

M. A. S., Cimarron, Kan. 1. Where can I find a book entitled Kindashan's Wife? 2. Also a book on Alaska?

1. We have never heard of the book. 2. Alaska, its Neglected Past and Brilliant Future, by B. W. James, published by Sunshine Publishing Co., Philadelphia.

Nemo, Carmen, Oklahoma. 1. Why is the prayer Jesus taught his disciples called the Lord's prayer? Is not the real Lord's prayer given in John 17? 2. What fields of labor are open to a young lady who does not feel called to be a foreign missionary, but who is desirous of giving her life-service to Christ?

1. It was so called because it was the only form given by Christ to his disciples. That in John 17 is the Saviour's own prayer; the other was meant for use by his followers. 2. There are many avenues of service at home. These include Bible women, home missionary work, general evangelistic work, church society and organization work, hospital and jail visiting, settlement work, teaching, etc.

A. S., Sioux Falls, S. Dak. Where was Bishop Henry C. Potter born, and where did he spend his early years?

He was born in Schenectady, N. Y. Part of his youth was passed in Philadelphia, where he was a student at the Episcopal Academy. Later he returned to Schenectady, to attend Union College.

Reader, Aplington, Ia. You are probably aware that different firms in Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, etc., are maintaining offices in almost every town in the West, generally termed "Board of Trade" offices, for the purpose of showing speculators, during business hours, the markets of grain, and other stocks or values. They have their own private wires, and pay good salaries to their managers for soliciting options. Many people of all classes patronize these places and deposit from $10.00 upwards, and take their chances on the rise or fall of the market. Well-to-do men, business men who ought to be "behind the counter," and many men in the agency business, are customers; also farmers. Some men neglect their business; some go in sheer desperation to support their families during dull times; some go for the excitement; but all in hopes of making gains. That it is nothing but gambling is apparent, as they sell without intention to deliver, not having the goods on hand, and they buy without the least intention to take the goods. Now, what shall a congregation of believing Christians do with members who either gamble as above stated, or rent buildings to these concerns for "Board of Trade" purposes, or who act as agents, managers, or solicitors for such business. Very often the pastor sees it; but his advice is not heeded, and some contend it is not gambling.

It is gambling, pure and simple, just as horse-racing is gambling. There is no actual purchase or sale, no real business transaction, but merely a wager on the rise or fall of values. All such operations are valueless, from an economic point of view, and they are pernicious in their influence upon real values, and hence immoral. We know, of course, that there are many who will stoutly defend such operations as legitimate; but there are, unfortunately, many things that are lawful, yet neither moral nor expedient. Anything that disturbs real values is immoral, from the economic standpoint. We need say nothing as to the gambling passion that is aroused in those that have such dealings—a passion which brings multitudes to ruin every year. Any Christian community or congregation that comes in contact with this species of speculation (gambling made easy and respectable) should avoid it as it would any other snare of the tempter. It is a lure to trap men, and ninety-nine out of every hundred who foolishly embrace the temptation to "make money easily" find to their sorrow that they have been the victims of men who are far more clever in the game than they can ever hope to be.

HUNGRY SCHOOL CHILDREN FED BY THE SALVATION ARMY

At the Salvation Army Breakfast Station in Cherry Street, New York, hundreds of hungry little children were fed during the recent severe weather, by the order of Miss Evangeline Booth, the new Commander of the Army. The children gathered at the door long before the station opened each morning, coming hungry, and going away fully satisfied with the bountiful meal provided for them. The breakfasts were varied; one morning consisting of good broth or soup and bread, the soup made with an abundance of meat and vegetables, while the bread was wholesome and good. Coffee, with plenty of milk and breakfast cereals, were served on other mornings, always with an abundance of bread. The children enjoyed these meals, and were, no doubt, in a much better condition to study than when they went to school breakfastless, or, at the most, with a meagre apology for that meal.

C. A. M., Kearney, Neb. 1. Does the present constitution of Peru guarantee social and religious liberty? 2. Who is the President of Peru at the present time?

1. By the terms of the constitution, there exists absolute political but not religious freedom, the charter prohibiting the public exercise of every other religion than the Roman Catholic, which is the religion of the state. But there is a certain amount of tolerance, there being Anglican churches and missionary schools in Callao, Lima, Cuzco. Census of 1896 gives 5,000 Protestants. 2. Senor Nicolas de Pierola, in whose favor Senor Manuel Candamo, installed Sept., 1903, recently resigned. CAROLINA HUIDOBRO.

T. W. S., Newark, O., sends this cheering note for the benefit of those who are complaining of the cold winter:

In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Feb. 1, a correspondent wants to know if last winter was not the coldest recorded. I answer, no; not by a good deal. In central Ohio we had but three or four days of cold in January and the same in February 1904. Now I will give you some data of the weather in January and February of other years. 1884, January 24th, 24 below; 25th, 26 below; 26th, 16 below. 1893: January 11th, 10 below; 15th, 12 below; 17th, 16 below; 19th, 6 below; 20th, 12 below. 1895: January 12th, 6 below; 25th, 2 below; 26th, 4 below; February 5th, 5 below; 6th, 6 below; 7th, 10 below; 8th, 10 below; 9th, 10 below. 1897: January 25th, 12 below; 26th, 10 below; 27th, 6 below; 28th, 6 below. 1899: February 8th, 5 below; 9th, 18 below; 10th, 25 below; 11th, 14 below; 12th, 12 below; 13th, 14 below; 14th, 8 below. You will see by the above that we had seven mornings in February, 1899, that were below zero.

J. D. D., St. John, Wash. Can you tell me where I can get the Life of Mary A. Livermore?

Mrs. Livermore's address is Melrose, Mass. Write to her direct.

Wm. L., Idaho Falls, Idaho. 1. What is the raven's cry? How would you spell it? 2. Where was Paul Du Chaillu born? 3. When will the subway tunnel under the East River be completed, and what will be its cost compared with that of the Brooklyn bridge?

The raven is of the crow family, and can be taught to imitate human speech. Its call in a wild state is like that of the crow, Caw-Caw! as nearly as it can be spelled.

2. Paul Du Chaillu was born in Paris, France, July 31, 1835. 3. It is a matter which time alone can determine, and the cost cannot be stated until the work is finished.

New Subscriber, Whaleyville, Va. In Genesis 2: 5, 6, we read, "The Lord had not caused it to rain upon the earth." We have recently heard it argued that it did not rain before the Flood. Tell us your opinion on the subject?

Some scientific writers have held that until the Flood, there was no rain upon the earth; that mists and dews fed the soil and caused vegetation to flourish luxuriantly; and that this vaporous atmosphere was not cleared until the great precipitation of the Flood wrought the change. These theories, however, are merely scientific speculation.

Subscriber, Windom, Minn. Do the words converted and regenerated both have precisely the same meaning? Or can a person be converted and not regenerated?

Conversion (or "turning," in the spiritual sense), is the act of a moment. It is the turning-point where the repentant sinner makes the "great decision," and, taking Christ's offer, sets his face heavenward, and enters upon the new life, resolved, with God's help, to live no longer a life of sin and worldliness. Regeneration, is change of heart or the "new birth," and a work which the Holy Spirit may brin to pass in a moment, as in the case of Paul instantaneous conversion and regeneratio It differs from sanctification, in that it is complete and perfect act, while sanctifica tion is progressive.

Mrs. A. S. Steele, founder and manage of the Home for Needy Children at Cha tanooga, Tenn., writes:

Your gift of $11.50 just received. My work co tinues to grow, and God adds his blessing. Th work is very precious to me, I feel so sorry f rich people who are hoarding their wealth, an for those who are simply lavishing it on then selves and their rich friends, when there are many little ones needing Christian training.

M. A. W. St. J., Fulton, Ont. 1. When and b whom was slavery introduced into the Unite States? 2. Can you give me any informatio concerning a book, entitled, The Ancient an Modern History of the Devil?

1. The first slaves were brought by Dutch man-of-war to Jamestown, Va., i 1620. 2. We never heard of the book.

Ella B. Hillsboro, O. 1. Where can one learn "massage," and is it a profitable profession 2. What positions are open to women in th civil service of the United States: what ar the qualifications: where can I gain further information?

Massage is considered to be a very fine treatment for certain troubles, and can be learned only rightly from physicians who have made it a study and practice. No doubt there are such in your town, or the nearest large city. Like every other profession, the profits depend largely upon the ability of the practitioner. 2. Write to the Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., for all instructions. Positions as teachers, matrons, seamstresses and physicians are open to women.

J. P. D., Sedalia, Colo. Was President Davis of the Confederate States the son of Col. S. B. Davis, of Wilmington, Del.?

No; he was the son of Samuel Davis, a planter, who lived in Christian, now Todd County, Ky.

J. W. P., Farmers Mills, N. Y. Does it tell anywhere in the Bible how many years Noah was in building the ark?

This a case where investigation fails and speculation is worthless. Some commentators have held that Gen. 6 : 3 implies that 120 years' warning was given to men to prepare for the Flood, and that Noah meanwhile built the ark; but the verse in question, more probably refers to the average limit of human life in that age.

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Worth of a Word

LANGUAGE is the splendid possession which lifts us above the lower orders of creation, and more than any other faculty, allies us to God. When God ade man in his image, he endowed him with speech. ll we prize sufficiently the value of words? The good ook says, "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by t: words condemned." Our thoughts are our own, until ey are translated into language they can do little rm or good. It is by the words we speak that we ake those around us happy or sorrowful. Take, for exaple, the common instance of the hasty word. Few of do not have it to regret. Children are told to think fore they speak, and the caution might well be given t children of an older growth. Something occurs to noy or vex, to awaken resentment or anger, and quick a sword leaps from the scabbard, the hasty word rings out to do its baleful work. Friends of many ars are sometimes separated by ill-considered words hich, too late, they would give a great deal to withaw. But words that wound are apt to leave scars. he wounds of a friend heal slowly. There is also the ult-finding word. No other s such frost-like effect on ousehold joy. A continual ream of fault-finding is so dessing that presently everye ceases the effort to do well. hildren and servants compreend that they have no chance ith a chronic fault-finder. A acher who finds constant fault ses influence over pupils, and employer who has this retched disposition is never ell served.

Words of praise, on the other and, are like sunbeams and ewdrops, and all other gentle nd tender things, which coax lants into bloom and fruit. hey do for character what the unshine does in the realm of ature.

The words most to be dreadd are those of malice and unharitableness. How mean and ow are words which stab an bsent acquaintance in the lark, which lend themselves to he repetition of unkind stories, nd to the service of unfriendly gossip. Words that are delibrately misleading and deceitul wear the livery of the devil. They have no use or place in the vocabulary of sincere, noble and right-living people. We need not dwell on words coarse, vulgar, or profane. Nor, except in our own case, need we feel called upon to think very much about impulsive and vehement words. These latter are at least not cowardly. It is our privilege to set a watch over our own words, to restrain words of indiscretion, and to refrain from words that are illnatured and savage. Words of intentional exaggeration are to be avoided.

It is possible to uplift a soul, and turn the whole tide of affairs from defeat to victory simply by speaking words of real encouragement and approval. From the present purpose it is apart to say anything about the beauty and rhythm of words, and the curious way in which they interpret thought. Glance the dictionary through, and you will find that words have color and music, and that they represent with vivid clearness and picturesque beauty ideas for which they stand.

They come from many sources and many lands. They are as old as the Garden of Eden, as new as yesterday. One finds the sonorous word coming from old Rome and the mellifluous from the honeyed-tongue of the Greeks. There are words from the Danish, Swedish, and Saxon; from the German; from the dialect of the Red man, in fact, from every part of the world, and every age of history in our English language. How beautiful are most of the words which are the names of flowers: as heather-bell, blue-bell, lily, snow-drop, rose, daisy, and the like. A flower is seldom christened by an ugly name. How beautiful are the names which describe running water: river, brook, stream, fountain. How picturesque are certain words which describe certain conditions: drape, which conveys the idea of covering with folds of cloth or silk; draggle, which is a disagreeable, slovenly, bespattered sort of word; drain, which carries in its very sound the thought of exhaustion, of never stopping until the last drop be gone. What a beautiful word is dainty. What sound of cymbals is in the word clang. How the word quell carries with it the thought of vanquishing a riot. What a brazen sound is in the word effrontery. How cool, and pleasing, and fizzing and bubbling, is the word effervesce. With what charm is the woman endowed who has a good vocabulary, who uses the right word in the right place, at the right time! How unpardonable is careless speech, and how poverty-stricken and meagre is the speech of those who dwell habitually with mean people, and indulge sordid thoughts.

One's power to use rich and beautiful words is greatly increased if one either has the advantage of living with scholarly persons, or of constantly reading good books. The works of the best writers are filled with strong and fine passages which illustrate what I mean. No one can read Ruskin or Carlyle, neither of whom is yet out of fashion, without largely adding to his vocabulary.

ALONG AT FOUR O'CLOCK

Along at four o'clock it is,
The work is laid aside;
The shining kitchen proves itself
The good wife's honest pride.

A savory smell arises from
Her cheery, bubbling pot;
The kettle soon will sing its song
Of supper nice and hot,

Now, John, come home, and don't be late,
Come home with kiss and smile for Kate.

Here is a little prayer which is worth repeating:

O sentinel at the loose swing door of my tempestuous lips,
Guard close to-day! Make sure no word unjust or cruel slips
In anger forth, by folly spurred, or armed with envy's whips.
Keep clear the way to-day.

And watchman on the cliff scarred heights that lead from heart to mind,
When wolf thoughts clothed in guile's soft fleece creep up,
O be not blind!
But may they pass whose foreheads bear the glowing seal-word, "kind":
Bid them God-speed, I pray.

And warden of my soul's stained house, where love and hate are born,
O make it clean, if swept must be with pain's rough broom of thorn!
And quiet impose, so straining ears with world-din racked and torn,
May catch what God doth say.

The little word yes or no, so easily spoken, has determined the destiny of many a life. Yes, the girl answers her lover, and becomes happy or wretched for the rest of her years. No, spoken in the hour of temptation, keeps a man strong and pure and brings him heaven's help.

Concerning Friends

A LARGE part of the pleasure of life springs from social intercourse and depends on our relations to our friends. There are, of course, people who have no genius for friendship. They live in isolation and seem contented with loneliness. Others are willing to be treated with friendly consideration, but they give nothing in return. Their attitude is that of the sovereign who must be sought, but cannot seek; or of the hermit who shuns society, but does not refuse the loaf that is left in a basket at the door of his hut. In the first instance they have an overweening degree of self-conceit. In the second, they have a measure of unkind and ungrateful indifference.

The majority of us care a vast deal about our friends. We like to give them pleasure. Our happiest hours are spent with the men and women most congenial to us. The love of the neighbor, implanted deeply in our hearts, ranks next to the love we bear our elder Brother, the best and dearest friend of all.

A group of friends, meeting often informally, or organized into an association for some definite end, may wonderfully broaden and bless one another. Staying closely at home is praiseworthy, but she who never ventures abroad finds that presently she is the bond slave of an iron routine, and he who spends his days in business and his evenings exclusively in his family, inevitably becomes a narrow and dull sort of man. Public spirit is necessary in both sexes, if we are to serve the present age and to do our duty to the community. To devote our whole energy, our entire strength to the small circle of our immediate kinsfolk, is a mistake which may have far-reaching consequences of evil.

The Bible says, "A man that hath friends must show himself friendly." Whoever can stand this test will not lack comrades loyal and true to stand at his side. Faithless and fickle natures may attract friendship for awhile, but they will not hold fast their friends. Once one has been disappointed in friends, or in a friend, the lost confidence cannot easily be restored. The cracked cup may be repaired, but it is pretty sure not to hold water so well as it did before it was damaged. A friendship is the worst for wear when a friend shows selfishness, meanness or jealousy.

Essential to the highest friendship are a common education, a common ideal, and a common hope. Friends may meet on the lower planes and yet be of varying degrees of culture; but for the highest expansion and efflorescence of regard, it is needful that there be comprehension of one another. Two who speak the same language will get on better, than if one speak a foreign tongue that his friend cannot understand, or if one express himself only in dumb show. The man or woman with low ideals as to honor, as to courtesy, as to self-denial, as to aspiration after righteousness, cannot find union of spirit in a friend who is striving after perfection in these qualities and endeavors. A hope in one divine Saviour, an anticipation of one eternal home, a love and faith that take God's goodness for granted, and never entertain a doubt, build a foundation for real friendship.

THE HEART OF THE WORLD

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

CHAPTER X—Continued

COMMINGS broke in again. "It is all sheer nonsense! The commercial world cannot be run on any such principle. Business is business, and must be run as such. It cannot be run like a Sunday School." He picked up his hat. "If the bank goes to the wall it will be your doing. If ruin faces us all you can take the blame. Fine thing! Your precious Christianity!"

He went out and left Judge Rodney and Wrightam together.

"It is what I expected," Wrightam murmured. The Judge eyed him with conflicting feelings.

"Your course is not altogether clear in its details. The whole affair is complicated. Your action will involve grave changes in all Lenox industries. Have you realized that?"

"I have, in part. I have prayed for wisdom to meet all these changing conditions. I desire to save as many as possible from disaster. I will do my utmost, Judge Rodney, to shield the innocent. But what other course is open to me, as a Christian, except to withdraw myself from schemes which are positively wrong and unchristian? Do you see anything else for me to do?"

The Judge answered slowly, a strange look in his eyes as he did so.

"I see no other course, logically, if you are really going to try to be a Christian. Of course, if your Christianity is nominal, that is one thing; but if it is real——"

The Judge rose to go. He held out his hand. "Whatever happens, Mr. Wrightam, I wish to assure you of my respect. I cannot doubt your sincerity. As to where that will lead you——"

"God knows. I will trust Him," Wrightam answered, tears in his eyes as he clasped Rodney's hand firmly. The Judge went out and left him alone.

He had been gone only a few moments, when the cashier of the bank opened the door, and said a reporter for the Times wanted to see the President of the bank.

Wrightam let him come in and told him the simple truth. The reporter could hardly trust his senses, but he rapidly took down the statement Wrightam furnished, and hurried out after the interview to write up for the first edition of the afternoon, the most remarkable occurrence ever chronicled by the Lenox papers.

That was a strange day in the experience of J. B. Wrightam. He stayed down at his office, telephoning out to his house that he would not be up to lunch, as usual. All the afternoon visitors, business acquaintances, crowded the office, angry, incredulous, astonished, overwhelmed at the occurrence. Out on the main street when the first edition of the Times appeared, men in excited groups stood about holding the paper, reading the astonishing news of the "Conversion of J. B. Wrightam, the mill magnate!" "Will withdraw from the Trust." "Effect of Dr. Stanton's preaching last Sunday." "Run on the bank is expected to-morrow." "Shares in Oreville have a tumble!" "Other members of the company enraged and aghast." "Probable effect on the actions of the Unions." "Harvey's views on the situation." "Unparalleled excitement in Lenox over the event."

It was after dark before Wrightam could get away. He started for home at last, and as he came out on the street the newsboys were even that late crying out his name and selling papers. He walked along, going over the day's experience. It had been full of crosses, bitter reproaches, threats, estrangements, revilings, curses from the men who, with him, had made Mammon their God. Still, at his heart was the peace of God and the love of his Redeemer. He was full of a strange joy, and had nothing to retract or change.

As he drew near home he began to think of his wife. All his other crosses were light by the side of this.

"God help me," he prayed, as he entered the house. "God help me and her!"

He went into the "den" after hanging up his coat and hat. It was dark, and he went through into the library. That was empty, and he went on to the dining-room. The table was set for dinner, and one of the servants was standing near the dumb-waiter.

"Where is Mrs. Wrightam?"

"I don't know, sir., I——" The girl seemed frightened and looked strangely at him. He went out and up the stairs, and called his wife's name. Getting no answer he suddenly turned, and, as if obeying some direction, went down into the "den" and turned on the light there.

As he did so he saw on his desk a piece of paper, placed on the middle of the blotter, addressed to him.

He picked it up, anticipating its contents, and read: "I am no longer your wife. I have read the accounts in the paper. The whole affair is disgraceful. I will not endure such a life. I am leaving you, and you need not expect me to return. Alfred is with me."

That was all, and he was dazed by the brief brutality of it. It mattered little to him afterwards that she had taken with her the family jewels and all the money she could secure from both Alfred and Eileen. For the moment the fact of the woman's departure out of his house and his life smote him deeply, and that was all he realized until, after a few moments, the last line began to detach itself from the rest. "Alfred is with me." His daughter, then, Eileen—had she——.

There was a rustling sound in the hallway, and he turned his heart in a tumult.

Eileen came in, timidly at first, then as she saw him standing there holding the note in his hand, she ran up to him, and with a sob threw her arms about his neck.

"Oh, father, I could not leave you! Father! Father! Do you need me now?"

"Thank God! Thank God! Dear child!" was all he could say as he clasped her to him, and she passed her hand over his face, wet with tears, as she cried again, "Father!" and that day of cross-bearing for the once selfish-hearted magnate came to a close with a radiance not of earth, filling the souls of father and daughter, as they mingled their tears of grief and affection in one never to be forgotten love of each other.

CHAPTERS XI AND XII

AFTER the first joyful exclamation of Wrightam over the fact of his daughter's love for him had become more real, question and answer revealed the facts of his wife's departure.

She had first commanded Eileen to go with her; then, when the girl steadfastly refused, she pleaded and threatened alternately. This did not move Eileen, and Mrs. Wrightam had finally written the note, and packing up all available valuables that she could carry, had gone away. Where, Eileen did not know.

In answer to her father's inquiry, she had heard her mother declare her intention of going back to the stage. As the handsome Mrs. Lynde, she had acted with remarkable success for a year after her divorce, and before her marriage to Wrightam. The old life always had peculiar attractions for her. Wrightam was certain she would return to it.

But his daughter filled his thought, even more than this event which had divided and broken his home. Eileen was really unknown to her father. A girl with extravagant tastes and a superficial education, she yet had a strain of the old Pilgrim blood of New England in her character. When the crisis had flashed up sharply and without warning, she had quietly, but with invincible firmness, made her decision to stay with her father. At the moment she flung her arms about his neck as he stood there in the "den," her nature grew at a bound in affectionate feeling for him. His religious experience was an unknown page to her, but her heart spelled without mistake his yearning and need as he faced her, and the revelation of that feeling affected him as a new experience, to add to his Christian faith a factor hitherto unknown.

"Eileen, girl, your father has had a strange day. In some ways the strangest of his life."

"Father, I have not been a good daughter to you, and I don't understand now. But—" she said it timidly, but tearfully, "you need some one; it did not seem to me I could leave you. Do you need me?"

The tears streamed over Wrightam's large, coarse face. Yet its coarseness was in reality washed away by those drops, every one of which was pure affection out of the spring of his new-born nature.

"Need you, girl? Your father is heart-hungry for you. Oh, I will be such a father to you, Eileen! If God will permit me to make good a part of my neglected past."

So they sat there and talked on of past and present and future; and over the disgrace of the faithless wif was gently spread the all-enveloping mantle of heaven-born relationship between these two which wa destined, by the will of the Divine, to grow tendere and deeper through the amazing experiences of Wright am's career in the weeks that followed.

Through all that period that now meant testing t the converted financier, he walked calmly and ever joyfully. The storm of public criticism, misunder standing and abuse burst full upon him. The paper published full and detailed accounts of his wife's ac tion, and with journalistic "enterprise" added column of scandal that had no foundation in truth except tha of surmise and rumor. Even Eileen was subjected t the torture of a browbeating process to extort the minutest items relative to her mother's flight and her own stay with her father. The most sacred and private feelings were deliberately exhibited as part of the "story" of the Wrightam family sensation.

All this fell brutally and unfeelingly on Wrightam and his daughter. Through it all he offered no rejoinder, asked for no redress and expected no quarter. Old friends fell away from him as from a plague. Members of Saint Cecilia regarded him with cold distrust. When the storm burst on the bank, Commings, Durand, Fleming and others saved themselves by every artifice known to their commercial diplomacy. Through all those days of stress, Wrightam lived straight on, putting his own fortune into the bank and stopping the run on it, and, true to his promise, paying out, dollar for dollar, to Commings and the other directors, every cent they had lost by the panic. Immense as his resources had been, the drain on them through this unexampled use, as the mill stock fell, was enormous. In his conscientious desire to redeem the promise to Commings, he began to realize, as the days grew into weeks, that his millions had shrunk to thousands, and his once limitless wealth was fast taking wings to fly away. The inevitable result he began to foresee, did not, however, disturb him. The money he once had worshiped he no longer deified. He even began to feel a sense of relief at the thought of beginning life new on an absolutely clean, honest basis, with no unclean dollars to haunt his memory and torture him with the silent, persistent accusation of a selfish past which God had forgiven.

Sitting in his "den" one evening at this time, when he first began to understand that he was no longer a millionaire or even a rich man, he was surprised to have Bruce Harvey call.

Harvey had been in Oreville after Wrightam's conversion. When he read the accounts in the papers, his lips had curled contemptuously. He had not believed it. But on returning to Lenox he had seen Stanton, and had been staggered at the minister's positive faith in Wrightam's sincerity. The events that followed the run on the bank, the surrender on Wrightam's part, to the other directors of all the Oreville stock to save them, the evident change of purpose in the life of the magnate, had seemed to Harvey incredible. His old distrust and hatred of Wrightam was too recent and too deeply intrenched, however, to be dislodged, and he still entertained a belief that the shrewd captain of industry had a game to play, and was using the religious dodge to make a grand coup that would place him at the head of the industrial column and rout his commercial rivals once for all, beyond hope of recovery for them.

"Why," said Harvey to Stanton, "I would as soon expect the devil himself to join the Church and be converted at heart as to expect J. B. Wrightam to stop loving money or power. He is an old bird. He has a card up his sleeve that he isn't showing you or the public."

Stanton felt hurt at Harvey's cold-blooded disbelief.

"If you don't believe the facts, go and see Wrightam for yourself. Test him in any way you can. But in the name of that judgment by which you will be judged yourself, Harvey, don't discredit as plain a case of God's dealing with a man as the world ever saw."

"Well, I don't mean to be unfair, Mr. Stanton," Harvey had replied, somewhat abashed; " but you must remember how many years I have been thinking of Wrightam as having horns and hoofs. I can't wipe out that picture in a minute."

But he took Stanton's suggestion, and called at Wrightam's that evening. When he walked into the "den" he was in a condition of mental curiosity, and a large reservation of distrust.

"Glad to see you, Brother Harvey," said Wrightam, heartily. "Take off your overcoat and draw up to the fire. It's cold out."

"Thank you," replied Harvey slowly. "But I guess I won't trouble to take off my coat. I can't stay long."

Wrightam looked at him earnestly, but did not repeat his invitation. Harvey coughed and seemed a little embarrassed.

"What can I do for you?" asked Wrightam.

"Nothing! Did you think I called to get anything?" Harvey said roughly.

Wrightham's face expressed surprise.

"I did not know. If I could be of any service——"

"See here, J. B., I am not fooled by this part you are acting. You've got a scheme. Well, I want to say, so have I. You want to crush the Union. That is the great desire of your life. Let me tell you, it can't be done." Harvey put his hand in his pocket and drew out a paper. "Read that!" he said, with a tone of coarse exultation that measured the limit of his reckoning with the man who had for years stood in his path as the enemy of every ambition he had ever felt.

Wrightam took the paper and read it with every expression of surprise.

It was a contract signed by over five thousand men in Lenox and Oreville mills, to withdraw from the mills and organize a joint-stock company to run on a co-operative basis, entirely independent of all aid or assistance from outside capital. It was the culmination of years of planning on Harvey's part, the result of painful wrestling with dull and slow minds, and an almost superhuman overcoming of prejudice, fear and conflicting forces at war in Labor's own camp.

It was, Harvey believed, the first really successful attempt ever made by organized Labor to free itself from the unequal union with Capital, where Capital claimed the lion's share of benefits.

Under the contract, most of the skilled labor in both the Lenox and Oreville mills agreed to withdraw and help form the new combination.

"This will be made public to-morrow. Perhaps you would like to take stock in the new company, Mr. Wrightam. I understand you have lost a little in the recent flurry," said Harvey with a sneer.

Wrightam made no answer. His eyes looked into the fire thoughtfully. Not even a flush of color had touched his face at anything Harvey had said. The man who sat clothed and in his right mind, had been too close to the source of Divine happiness and peace to feel disturbed over these common taunts. Harvey looked at him uneasily. He did not comprehend this new man.

Wrightam handed back the contract.

"I hope you will succeed, Mr. Harvey. But I know you will not, unless you put into the scheme one thing which I fear is altogether lacking."

"What's that?"

"Let me ask a question. In this list of names, how many men have you who have become Christians during the Rink meetings?"

Harvey's face grew dark with passion. Then he experienced an unusual emotion of shame, as the incident with Stanton over that event recurred to him.

"Very few, if any, I guess. We don't need them. We can get along better without the snivellers."

WING
PIANOS

ARE SOLD DIRECT FROM THE FACTORY—AND IN NO OTHER WAY

You Save From $75 to $200.

When you buy a WING PIANO, you buy at wholesale. You pay the actual cost of making it with only our wholesale profit added. When you buy a piano as many still do—at retail—you pay the retail dealer's store rent and other expenses. You pay his profit and the commission or salary of the agents or salesmen he employs—all these on top of what the dealer himself has to pay to the manufacturer. The retail profit on a piano is from $75 to $200. Isn't this worth saving?

SENT ON TRIAL—Anywhere

We pay Freight. No money in Advance

We will place a WING PIANO in any home in the United States on trial without asking for any advance payment or deposit. We pay the freight and all other charges in advance. There is nothing to be paid either before the piano is sent or when it is received. If the piano is not satisfactory after 20 days' trial in your home, we take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing and are under no more obligation to keep the piano than if you were examining it at our factory. There can be absolutely no risk or expense to you.

Do not imagine that it is impossible for us to do as we say. Our system is so perfect that we can without any trouble deliver a piano in the smallest town in any part of the United States just as easily as we can in New York City and with absolutely no trouble or annoyance to you and without anything being paid in advance or on arrival either for freight or any other expense. We take old pianos and organs in exchange.

A guarantee for 12 years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship or material is given with every WING PIANO.

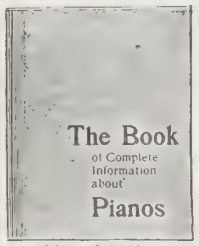
Small, Easy, Monthly Payments.

IN 37 YEARS OVER 40,000 WING PIANOS have been manufactured and sold. They are recommended by seven Governors of States, by musical colleges and schools, by prominent orchestra leaders, music teachers and musicians. Thousands of these pianos are in your own State, some of them undoubtedly in your very neighborhood. Our catalogue contains names and addresses.

Mandolin, Guitar, Harp, Zither, Banjo— The tones of any or all of these instruments may be reproduced perfectly by any ordinary player on the piano by means of our Instrumental Attachment. This improvement is patented by us and cannot be had in any other piano.

WING ORGANS are made with the same care and sold in the same way as WING PIANOS. Separate organ catalogue sent on request.

YOU NEED THIS BOOK



If You Intend to Buy a Piano No Matter What Make.

A book not a catalogue—that gives you all the information possessed by experts. It tells about the different materials used in the different parts of a piano; the way the different parts are put together; what causes pianos to get out of order, and in fact is a complete encyclopedia. It makes the selection of a piano easy. If read carefully, it will make you a judge of tone, action, workmanship and finish. It tells you how to test a piano and how to get good from bad. It is absolutely the only book of its kind ever published. It contains 156 large pages and hundreds of illustrations, all devoted to piano construction. Its name is "The Book of Complete Information About Pianos." We send it free to anyone wishing to buy a piano. All you have to do is to send us your name and address.

Send a Postal To-day while you think of it, just giving your name and address, or send us the attached coupon and the valuable book of information, also full particulars about the WING PIANO, with prices, terms of payment, etc., will be sent to you promptly by mail.

The Grave of Lafayette

WHOEVER visits Paris should spend a little time at the cemetery, and should at least see the celebrated Pere La Chaise, with its fine old names and beautiful monuments. The Montmartre Cemetery also deserves a glance, if only on account of Heine's grave. The other cemeteries are seldom visited by strangers. For this reason, most visitors to Paris are unacquainted with the Picpus Cemetery. This city of the dead is a wonder of art. It is the sum total of melancholy, of loneliness, of solitude, and yet highly interesting. Here are many graves of the old French aristocracy—reminders of bygone princes of the house of Salm-Kyrbourg. Many other Germans who were friends of freedom are slumbering, headless, under the green turf, their peaceful sleep of death. They were victims of "The Terror."

To the right of a door in the wall are two slabs, surrounded by plain iron fences, on one of which is a small flag bearing the starry banner of the United States. The slab reads as follows: "Lafayette, Lieutenant-General, Member de la Chambre des Deputes, ne a Chavagnac, Haute-Loire." Next to him rests his spouse, Madame de Reailles. This is the reason why the Picpus Cemetery has become great ones—who in this quiet corner are sleeping the last sleep. In the Picpus Cemetery we read such names as those of Montmorency, La Rochefoucauld, Remusat, Gouy d'Arcy, De Noailles, Prince de Polignac, Talleyrand-Perigord, etc. On a green terrace are several dark cypress trees and five upright gravestones, the latter erected as memorials to the German known to Americans, and why, in the register which the Concierge keeps, the names that appear are mostly those of Americans. They come to visit the grave of the gallant Lafayette, the friend of Washington and the lover of America and its people, who returned his friendship with an admiration such as has never been paid to any foreigner before nor since.

The Preacher and the Beggar

AN ALLEGORY TRANSLATED FROM THE SWEDISH BY E. M. HELTZEN

A PREACHER prayed to God unceasingly for eight years, to mercifully show him the way to heaven. At last he was told in a dream to go to a certain church, at the door of which he would find a man who would instruct him in the divine life.

When he arrived at the church, he found outside the door a poor beggar, who was very meanly clad. The preacher greeted him with these words:

"God give thee a good day, my friend."

The poor man replied, "Sir, I never had a bad day."

"God grant thee a good and happy life," said the preacher.

"What do you mean?" said the beggar. "I have never been unhappy."

"God bless thee, my friend; and pray tell me your meaning by such statements?" said the preacher.

"That I will gladly do," said the beggar. "I said first, that I had never had a bad day, because I always praise the Lord when I am hungry, and I always thank him when it is raining, snowing, or freezing; whether the weather be good or bad, and when I am despised, ignored or insulted, so I have never had a bad day, and I have never been unhappy since I learned to submit to the will of God, convinced that whatever he does is ever good, and I do not desire anything outside of God's own good and perfect will."

The preacher exclaimed, "Suppose the will of God should be to cast you deep down into hell?"

"If he should do so," answered the beggar, "I can only say that I have two arms to embrace him with, and holding him fast, I should be indescribably more content even there."

The learned man understood from this that a humble submission to the will of God, together with a deep humility, is the shortest way to receive the Divine love.

The preacher then asked the beggar where he came from. The poor man said that God had sent him.

"Where did you find God?" asked the former.

"I found him where I had forsaken all other creatures," replied the beggar. "I found him in his Word—with the poor in spirit, the clean-hearted, and the merciful."

"But who are you?" inquired the teacher.

"I am a king," said the beggar.

"Where is your kingdom?" asked the former.

"In my soul," answered the latter. "I have learned to keep under subjection and to rule my desires and inclinations, to control my mind and my body, and this power is undoubtedly higher than all others in the kingdoms of this earth."

The teacher then asked him how he had been able to reach such a state, and the king of his own soul replied, "Through silence, wakefulness, meditation and prayer. I could not find rest and peace in any created thing or being, and I therefore sought him, who shall never forsake me."

A Pentecostal Revival

BY GILBERT W. SHERIN

THE very remarkable sight of 364 people joining the church at one time, was witnessed by a large congregation in New York City on the first Sunday morning of this month. It was Calvary M.E. Church, corner of Seventh Avenue and 129th Street, that this wonderful stand was taken for Christ. Such a great accession in one Sunday is unprecedented in the recent religious history of New York.

REV. C. L. GOODELL, D.D.

REV. C. H. TAYLOR

The increase was the result of revival meetings which, beginning with Watch Night Service, were held all through the month of January. Rev. Charles L. Goodell, D.D., the pastor, preached every night except Saturdays, and was ably assisted by Rev. C. Howard Taylor, the junior minister. The officiary of the church were in hearty sympathy with the movement, and the meetings, which were successful from the first, grew more and more enthusiastic as they continued. On account of the attendance being so large, the services were held in the church proper. Not an evening passed in which there were not at least five conversions, and at some services, between forty and fifty confessed Christ. In the afternoons the pastor, his assistant, and the two deaconesses visited those who were spiritually interested.

After the last meeting had been held, it was found that 286 people had expressed a desire to be received into the church on probation; 69 were children, and of the 217 adults, 139 were men and 60 were heads of families. Never before in the history of the church had so many given their hearts to God in a single month.

The following Sunday, Feb. 5th, was observed as a Day of Jubilee. Besides the new converts, there were 67 persons received into membership by letters from other churches, and 11, who had been on probation, became members in full. Of those who joined by letter, 36 came from twelve other denominations. Bishop Charles R. Fowler of the Methodist Church, Presiding Elder C. W. Millard, and the Rev. Drs. Buckingham, Anderson and North were present at the service. The church was packed to the doors. Mr. Taylor, the assistant pastor, read the long list of names, and when the people went forward, they filled the space in front of the altar and formed long lines down the aisles. After Dr. Goodell had asked the usual questions of discipline, Bishop Fowler made a short address and Dr. North, a former pastor, expressed his pleasure at being once more with those to whom he had preached twelve years before. The reception of members was followed by the baptism of nearly thirty persons, and the administering the Holy Communion to over 900.

Dr. Goodell has been pastor of Calvary Church only ten months. Previous to May 1st, 1904, he was stationed at Hanson Place M. E. Church, Brooklyn, where he preached for seven years. During his pastorate there, between 150 and 250 were received into that church annually. Since the doctor became pastor of Calvary, its membership has increased from 1,400 to 2,029, and the congregation is the largest of the Protestant faith in Manhattan.

The Revival at Danville, Ky.

SCENES like those witnessed at Danville, Ky., have been rare in that section. Major Hilton and Mr. G. C. Tullar have seen many evangelistic movements, but seldom one that for depth and intensity compares with this. In spite of the severity of the weather, the churches in which the meetings were held were crowded from the beginning, and at each service there were many who rose to ask for prayers, and among them large numbers were led to Christ. The culmination of the revival came on Wednesday, Feb. 1, when all business in Danville was suspended, and employers and employees attended the services in a body. It was an all-day meeting, and large numbers brought their lunch and stayed the day through. Major Hilton had the assistance of Prof. J. C. Acheson and Mr. John Van Winkle in the main meeting and in the inquiry room.

Revival in Lancaster, Pa.

LANCASTER, PA., has just had a very remarkable revival. Over three hundred conversions are reported in nine days. The Martin Auditorium, where Evangelist Rev. C. H. Yatman conducted the meetings, was packed to the doors. The meetings were union, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. Mr. Yatman is now in Guelph, Ontario, and goes for March to union meetings in San Antonia, Texas.

Books Received

Chuggins, the Youngest Hero with the Army, a Tale of the Capture of Santiago, by H. Irving Hancock. Illustrated. That Chuggins was a remarkable youth the readers of this capital little story of army life will soon discover. Just the kind of book of adventure that boys like. Henry Altemus Co., Philadelphia, publishers.

Parables of Life, by Hamilton W. Mabie. Illustrated. This, as the author explains, "is a collection of short papers illustrative of phases vital experience"—quaint, dreamy, mystical, almost Oriental parables, yet each with a touch of comforting philosophy and helpful spirituality. Pp. 158; top gilt, cloth covers. The Macmillan Co., New York and London, publishers.

The Sea-Wolf, by Jack London. Illustrations by Aylward. This is the latest story by this brilliant young American author. It has in it the brine of the deep sea and the bleakness of the Arctic, but it has also an exciting story of love and adventure, with some strong character drawings and intense dramatic action. Altogether a remarkable book. Pp. 366. Price $1.50. Cloth. The Macmillan Co., New York and London, publishers.

Jimmie Moore of Bucktown, by Melvin E. Trotter, is a realistic tale of mission work in the city's slums. They were a bad lot over in Bucktown, but through the honest efforts of a poor little newsboy and his implicit faith in the Saviour, one neighborhood was reclaimed, and every evil resort closed. It took a deal of faith and hard work, but at last little Jimmie could exclaim: "Gee! dis don't look no more like old Bucktown dan a man what's smokin' looks like a Christian." Published by Winona Publishing Co., Chicago, Ill. Price 75 cts.

The Most Popular College Songs, selected from the songs of all the colleges. An excellent selection, which contains all the standard favorites, words and music, clearly printed and in a form which should make the volume a popular one. There are about a hundred of the best, affording a wide range of choice and suited to all voices. With such a collection, young people of musical tastes and fond of singing can pass many a pleasant and happy hour. Price 50 cents; 90 pages. Hinds, Noble & Eldredge, 31-35 West Fifteenth Street, New York, publishers.

"A Lamp to the Feet"

Received the Red Letter Edition of the Bible, and am very much pleased with it. I consider it a most beautiful work. I hope, as we read its pages, it may be a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path. I would not part with it, as I treasure it as one of the necessaries of my life. I trust you may send many of those Bibles into homes, and that it may direct many to Christ.

A Famous Temperance Evangelist

FROM several New England towns come reports of a vigorous Temperance Campaign of a distinctly Christian character. It is conducted by Mr. E. Tennyson Smith, an English orator who, in his own country and in New Zealand and Australia, has aroused a strong temperance feeling in the churches. Mr. Smith has had to bear a great deal of odium and abuse, no small part of which came from the temperance ranks, on account of the aggressive stand he took on the subject of the complicity of the Church with the liquor traffic.

MR. E. TENNYSON SMITH

From an investigation he made in England, he learned that in a large number of churches some of the deacons and other office-holders were liquor dealers. Their wealth and influence had succeeded in securing their election. Mr. Smith was stirred to the depths of his soul by the thought that men whose business was working ruin and misery on the community were thus honored by the Churches. He vigorously protested before several Methodist Conferences and other religious bodies, but with no result. He was met by the contention that the church officers in question were genuine Christians, and in many instances philanthropists. Undaunted by opposition, Mr. Smith insisted that the liquor curse was working so much mischief to society that the Church of Christ was in duty bound to fight the traffic to the bitter end, and ought not to admit to membership, much less elect to office, any man who was directly or indirectly engaged in it. The campaign was waged without compromise, and the men who believed with Mr. Smith were organized under the name of the "Ironsides."

For about ten years Mr. Smith has been fighting this battle, and his "Ironsides" have steadily supported his efforts. Gradually he has made an impression on individual Churches and has so stirred the public conscience on the matter that now there are few churches in which a liquor dealer could be elected to office. He has also carried the war into the colonies. In 1890 he went to New Zealand and Australia, and for five years labored indefatigably. During that time he traveled over 50,000 miles, and delivered over 1,500 addresses. He had the gratification of securing 32,000 temperance pledges. The Churches of the two colonies thanked him heartily for his services, and the temperance cause took new life.

Returning to England in 1896, Mr. Smith resumed his campaign, and there are few towns in which his voice has not been heard. In Birmingham, Liverpool, and other large cities, he was greeted by enormous and enthusiastic audiences, to which he appealed for support in the aggressive work he had taken up.

Mr. Smith was invited to this country by the Twentieth Century Pledge-Signing Crusade. He has already labored in the Massachusetts towns of Marlboro, Easton, Lynn, Brockton, and Worcester. At Brockton his speeches materially contributed to the decisive victory for no license. He has been urged to continue his work until next fall and has consented, but with the stipulation that opportunity be accorded him to accept the invitations of several Chautauquas and other summer gatherings which have sought his services. Mr. Smith is a bright and entertaining speaker, with a clear, strong, evangelistic spirit. It is an interesting fact that he attributes his temperance inspiration to John B. Gough, for whose memory he has the most profound veneration.

Dr. Keigwin in New York

SELDOM has a call to a minister involved so much sorrow as that of the West End Presbyterian Church of New York to Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin. The Park Church of Newark, N. J., which Dr. Keigwin has served so long and so faithfully, loved him with a very tender affection and it has been very hard to part with him. Of course it was recognized that the field of usefulness to which Dr. Keigwin was called was wider and more influential than the Newark pastorate. His people, therefore, could not urge him to stay with them. They knew his value, and that knowledge made it still more clearly a duty to yield him to the sphere in which he could do the most good.

There could be no question in Dr. Keigwin's mind as to the unanimity of the call that was tendered him. The assistant pastor, the officers and members of the New York church were as one in urging him to come. Since the removal of Dr. J. Balcom Shaw to Chicago, the church has been without a pastor. In Dr. Keigwin they were sure that they had found a man whose energy and pastoral oversight, as well as his pulpit eloquence, fitted him for the charge. A deputation of forty persons waited on him to beg him to accept the invitation. Dr. Keigwin called his people together and frankly explained his position. The one question that weighed with him, he said, was not the higher influence nor the larger salary, but whether as the Lord's servant, he should recognize in the call the voice of God. No true servant would ignore or disobey that voice. He asked his people to pray that he might be directed aright. The result is the one the Newark people feared. The New York church has the pastor of its choice, and hopes for a period of great prosperity.

Called Higher

On the 14th day of last December, Mrs. Louisa Cresswell was called higher. She passed away at her home, 93 Marion Street, Bridgeton, N. J., in her seventy-fourth year.

Died December 17, 1904, Mr. J. R. Morris, at his home in Baldwin, Miss. Mr. Morris was an upright and respected man, and a faithful, consistent member of the Methodist Church.

James E. Anderson, one of the pioneer residents of Bellevue, O., recently passed away at his home on Wood Street. Mr. Anderson leaves a wife, son and daughter, and many loving friends, to mourn his loss. He was the son of the late Alvin Anderson, and was born at Canadice, N. Y., Aug. 13, 1836.

Mrs. Weston G. Grannis died very suddenly at her home in Litchfield, Conn. Mrs. Grannis was the daughter of Julius and Jeannette Glover, and was born on the 16th of August, 1857. Mr. and Mrs. Grannis have made their home in Litchfield for twenty-two years. Mrs. Grannis was an active member of the Congregational Church, and was especially interested in foreign missions.

Joseph T. Scroggy was born in Pemberton, N. J., Sept. 25, 1841, and died in the same town on Christmas day, 1904. He was a veteran of the Civil War, serving as one of the best and bravest of soldiers, in the Fourth Regiment of the New Jersey Volunteers. He spent six weeks in Libby Prison. In 1876 he enlisted for life as a "soldier of the Cross," and through many years of trial he has ever been faithful to his "Great Commander."

A Reader's High Tribute

I notice that my last five years' subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has expired, and I therefore send check for $7.50 for five years more, from the expiration of my former subscription.

I want to take this opportunity to tell you how highly I esteem THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In my opinion, it is the best paper of the kind published in the world to-day. It is interesting, profitable, spiritual and always true to the Word of God. May God most richly bless you and your associates, in the furthur prosecution of the great publishing enterprise in which you are engaged for the Master.

In Honor of Washington

BY MRS. SUSAN M. GRIFFITHS

THE girls in the millinery room of Briggs & Harmon's department store, ld a splendid view of the monument dur- ig the entire process of its erection. The to great windows of their room reaching t the floor, overlooked the junction of sleets where the monument was placed: a tbute of the city of Lenore, to the beloved lther of his Country — Washington, the eat! the noble! the true!

It was only a shaft of spotless Italian arble, with an excellent bust of the great an crowning the summit, but the little ty of Lenore was very proud of it. It as the one public monument of the place, id in future, distances were to be meas- ed by it. "As far as the monument"; A block or two from the monument"; Go to the monument and turn," etc., was stined to become the favorite expressions the people.

Once erected, there were to be beautiful id appropriate dedicatory exercises. The overnor of the State had been urgently vited to be present and deliver an ad- ess, the military band from New Har- ersville had been duly employed to dis- ourse patriotic music, the school children ere to be out in a body to sing delightful horuses, the mayor and two other very rominent citizens expected to have a good eal to say, and altogether a fine time was nticipated. The monument was to be in erfect readiness by the twenty-second of February, and upon that eventful day, uring the dedicatory ceremonies, all the usiness houses were enjoined by the city ouncil to close their doors.

"'Much ado about nothing,'" said one of the millinery girls, Sarah Sharp by name. These Washington anniversaries make me ired. The idea of fairly making a god of hat man who has been dead for an age."

"'He, 'being dead, yet speaketh,'" ven- ured Milly Tyrrel, whose love for great characters was well known.

"And telleth the story of the little hatchet," added Maria Sprague, with a omical grimace, "and dulleth the edge in the telling."

The girls laughed in chorus.

"I tell you what it is, girls," said Louise Landon, twisting a bow into shape with deft fingers and pinning a spray of flowers on a hat she was trimming to try the effect, "the tale of the little hatchet is about worn threadbare. It is like the old-fash- ioned Sunday School book, too good to be true. I have always had my doubts about Master Georgie shouting out in angelic tones, 'I cannot tell a lie, father!' I'm more inclined to the opinion that his father caught him in the act and gave him a whip- ping to make him own up."

"Don't be sacrilegious, Louise," said another of the girls, with a merry laugh. "You are speaking profanely of sacred his- tory. Tell me how to place these plumes on Miss McKinney's hat. I don't know as it matters much where they go, though, for ten to one, the hat will come back thirty times before the lady is suited. What an old fraud she is."

"Needs some Washingtonian seed-truth implanted in the soil of her heart," said Sarah Sharp. "Honestly, girls, do you think there really is anything in it?"

"In what?"

"Why, in all this eulogizing of George Washington the great, to be sure. Do you suppose, for instance, that it does the children any good to have his birthday ob- served in the public schools, to spout speeches and songs in praise of his mem- ory, and all that sort of thing?"

"I am quite positive that it does good." The speaker was one who had not uttered a word before; a fair young girl with seri- ous brown eyes and a calm, clear, resolute voice. She looked up as she said it, and at the group of girls sitting about the room. She spoke with spirit and courage. "I am sure of it," she reiterated, "not only because I can testify to the influence it has had upon my own life, but because I know that the power of a great and good character, as well as a great and good action, never fails in producing good re- sults. The hero that the man Washington became was in embryo in the heart of the boy. It took as great and divine a cour- age for the little boy to voluntarily con- fess the truth to his father as it did for the man he became to face the cannon's mouth. We laugh at the story of the little hatchet as trite and old-fashioned, hardly worthy of the smart boys of our day, but 'I cannot tell a lie, father,' are immortal words to me. I can imagine just how God and the angels must have loved the child for them, for they were brave words. Let me tell you it takes courage to speak an unpleas- ant truth."

Having quietly delivered herself of these words, the speaker left the room for something, and there was a stir among the girls.

"Whew!" said Sarah Sharp, with a com- ical gesture. "That's the first gun fired in salute of the heroic dead. Dear me, who would have thought that little Marian Wesley had 'long, long thoughts' in her head, and was capable of blossoming out into such a patriotic speech as that? Isn't she the strangest girl anyway? You never know what she is going to say, nor how she is going to say it."

"Yes," assented Milly Tyrrel, "she is a little bit peculiar, but she is as good as gold. I shall remember that little speech of hers. I think it will help me to honor the memory of Washington as I never have done before. It does take courage to speak the truth, and to act it, too. Per- haps Marian knows something of this from experience, girls. She is such a quiet, reserved little body nobody knows what trials her life may possess. She never says anything about herself, but I am posi- tive she has something to bear that we are not aware of."

It was very true; Marian Wesley was a bit of a peculiarity. As Milly Tyrrel said, the girls knew little about her, although she had been associated with them in the workroom for over a year. Aside from the fact that her father was dead and her family was more or less dependent upon her exer- tions, nothing was known, although much was surmised. The girls did not know how many members her family was composed of nor where she lived, even. They knew she took the Vine Street car every evening and left it at West End Avenue; but, though kindly and pleasant with one and all, she made no special friends, had never invited one of them to visit at her home, and steadi- ly resisted all invitations that would lay her under such an obligation. Rather silent and reserved, she seldom spoke at any length unless aroused as she had been that morning by the slur upon Washington's memory, and then, as we have seen, she could speak straight to the point in defence of right and truth. She was very neat in her dress; exceptionally clean, in fact; but her garb was plain and inexpensive, and most carefully preserved, being a black walking-skirt and simple shirt-waists of gingham and percale. It did not seem to trouble her in the least that all the other girls had change of raiment galore, wore handsome silk waists every day, dressed their hair with expensive combs, and spent a small fortune in ribbons and laces and other pretty things that all girls love. She simply could not afford such luxuries, she said decidedly, and went steadily on her way. The girls all liked her, though, as they could not make a companion of her, she could not be said to be popular with them; but she was highly valued as one of the swiftest and most efficient workers in the room.

The twenty-second of February dawned bright and fair, but before the hour for the dedication of the Washington monument the sky was overcast with clouds and a chill wind was blowing from the East.

Promptly, however, at the appointed time, the stores and business houses all over the city closed their doors, the street cars stopped running, and the crowd gathered to witness the ceremonies. Flags and ban- ners were flying from every building in the vicinity, and the monument itself was beautifully draped in graceful folds of the red, white and blue. The band struck up the National Hymn, and down each of the four broad streets forming a junction, in the middle of which stood the monument, came a long line of school-children, bearing "In short, I have shown you just how we make the mince meat that really and truly produces pies 'like mother used to make,' makes enough for 24,000,000 pies a year, and requires, among other things, 250,000 bushels of fine New York apples every year.

flowers and chaplets, and banners and flags. They flanked the monument upon two sides, six or eight deep, and immediately burst forth, as with one voice, in a glorious song of praise in honor of the hero of the hour, which had been composed for the occasion. Following this came the address of the Governor of the state, the Mayor of the city, and others, which, though most excellent, were somewhat prosy and tedious. A fine rain had begun to fall, and to protect themselves from it the girls from the millinery department made their way into the big vestibule of the great store building. There was quite a little crowd gathered there already, in the midst of which was a group of mischievous cash boys cruelly tormenting a misshapen and impish-looking dwarf, one look at whom gave convincing proof of horrible idiocy. He was gesticulating wildly and mouthing out unintelligible words and sentences, to the great delight of the small boys, who were enlivening him by pulling his coarse hair, twisting him about in different directions, shoving him into a corner and pulling off his hat to further expose his pitifully hideous face, which was covered with bristling whiskers, and mocking his uncouth gestures and grimaces.

"Gracious!" exclaimed Sarah Sharp, in an undertone, "where did that beastly creature come from? I didn't know there was such a hideous monstrosity in town. He is a man, and not four feet high. Ugh, what a sight he is!"

"Hush!" said Louise Landon, as Marion Wesley swept past them with a white, pitiful face. Right into the midst of the gaping crowd she pushed her way, shoved aside the boy-torments with a strong hand, and, throwing a loving, protecting arm about the misshapen figure of the poor dwarf, said, in a voice trembling with indignant feeling: "Don't, boys! Please, don't! It is so cruel to torment one of the Lord's unfortunates. This is my own poor, foolish brother. He must have slipped away from home by some mischance. Will one of you be so kind as to get me a carriage?"

One! A half dozen rushed, scrambling over each other—dear, repentant little fellows—to do her bidding, and in a few minutes, with the impish dwarf clinging to her with uncouth demonstrations of love and delight, Marion entered the coach and was driven away from the crowd of curious eyes.

"Well," said one of the girls, drawing a long breath, "what do you say to that?"

"I say," said Louise Landon, "that it was an act of the highest courage; a magnificent act in honor of the truth and—Washington."

Marian did not return to work that day; but the next morning, when she appeared as usual in the workroom, the girls presented her with a pot of beautiful American Beauties in full bloom.

"In honor of Washington!" said Sarah Sharp, significantly.

And Marian understood, and thanked them in her heart.

Christian Speech*

WHAT are words? Mere breath, we are sometimes told, but what influence they have! More than once a cutting speech has led to a war in which thousands have perished. Almost daily we read of murder being committed under the provocation of an insulting remark. How many persons there are who have every comfort, and many luxuries, whose lives are a burden to them through the caustic tongue of a husband or a wife. More painful than a blow is the sharp speech that rankles long after it is uttered. Solomon thought it was better to dwell in a corner of the housetop than with a brawling woman in a wide house, and there are many women who have just as good reason for wishing to escape a brawling man. A thousand years later, James found things no better. So difficult did he consider the duty of keeping the tongue in order, that he said, a man who was able to bridle it was a perfect man, who was able to bridle the whole body.

Difficult it is, but the Christian ought not to shrink from it on that account. The help within his reach that enables him to overcome other sins, is available to curb the sins of the tongue. There is nothing too hard for the Lord, if a man will put himself in his hands. True, it is necessary for real reform to go deeper than the tongue. The angry spirit needs to be expelled; the hasty temper needs to be controlled; the fretful, complaining disposition needs to be composed. The tongue renders ready service to these demons within and gives expression to their presence. How often a man feels within an hour of his uttering some harsh speech, that it was not he who spoke, but the passions in his heart that overpowered him. So long as they remain in possession it is hopeless to try to control the tongue, which is merely their servant.

The Christian may learn from his own sensations the evil of a disagreeable speech. When some one speaks rudely or discourteously to him, he suffers, and ought to avoid the fault in himself. Yet even men of a pure nature are often heedless in this matter. They are impatient with folly and answer back with a pungency that lacks the quality of mercy. The kindly reproof has more power than the sneering, contemptuous utterance. It heals and sooths while it remedies the defect.

Perhaps it would not be going too far to say that the Christian may be known by his speech. There are, it is true, hypocrites whose canting utterances may deceive the best judges, but the note seldom rings true. The kindly sympathy, the gentle greeting, the patient forbearance—all these are indications of the spirit under control. Even when it is necessary to take a decided stand in opposition to another, it is possible to so moderate the voice and show consideration for an opponent's feelings as to take away the sting of conflict. Here, as in our general conduct, the grace lauded by the Apostle should bear sway. Love is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, beareth all things, hopeth all things.

A traveler in the West tells us that he noticed at several points on the road notices to the engineers to close their ashboxes. Inquiring the meaning, he learned that they were set at the approach to a wooden bridge, on which, if a live coal fell, a fire might be caused. He urges his readers to follow the same practice in their conversation, for many an angry fire has been caused by the accidental dropping of a burning word. The same writer calls attention to the fact that five sceptical words cost Zacharias forty weeks' silence. All the evil that Lord Byron did by his magnificent poems is attributed to his mother, who, though she loved and admired her brilliant son, soured his disposition by continual fault-finding and capricious complaints.

THE LORD'S COMING

BY REV. ALFRED WALLER*

THERE is no future event that is of so much importance to Christians as the Second Coming of Christ. But it is frequently misunderstood. There are three comings referred to, the first is to take away sin, the next to take away his people, and lastly, his coming in power. His first coming, that for the taking away of sin, has taken place; it was finished on Calvary, and his people, the Spirit is even now seeking to bring out in every town and village. His second coming will be to fetch his Bride, but we must not narrow that down, for I take it that all those who have been saved by his precious blood, and do his bidding are his Bride. Abraham and all the old worthies of the old time had not this heritage. And the Holy Spirit is still seeking out for the Bridegroom, Jesus, a people to serve him, and when the number is made up, then will he come for his Bride. But let us see how he will come, and where.

By the Holy Spirit a people will be gathered out of this world; this having been accomplished, and the Holy Spirit having finished his work that was given him to do, like Jesus finished on Calvary the work that was given him to do, he will return with Jesus and his Bride, the Church, to heaven, and the earth will then be left without the Spirit and the Church. His first coming has taken place, when he died for our sins on Calvary, the next time is that event of all events when he shall come to carry away his Bride, and that time will be the next event in history. Many people think very little of this matter, and just as the men of old despised his birth and crucified him, so the men of today engaged in the many vocations of life will become indifferent, callous, and deprived of the real life they should have.

We are getting ready for the end, and these things must be. We say even now, that in order to procure peace we must maintain a large standing army. If a man should build a ship unsinkable, the next thing to be done will be the invention of a projectile to go right through that ship to sink it. So we shall go on, effort against effort, until we get fenced up to the mouth with our armaments. Then will he come again as he said on the Mount Olivet, or rather as the angels said with the words, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you to heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." So the next time he came it would be for his own people.

There had been a sea of trouble in Israel when he first came, and Israel looked and longed for a deliverer, even as they look now for one. Their national state has sunk them to the position of longing for a Messiah. When Pilate asked him the question, "Art thou the King of the Jews?" He had replied, "My kingdom is not of this world." On one occasion when the people tried to make him king, he put it down, as he always did, by the answer, "My kingdom is not of this world. My kingdom is not yet come, I have work to do." When the Jews wanted to make him king they mistook him, or as a Jew once told me, "We missed him," that is to say, they missed the object of his mission. Surely the fact of the Jews crucifying him, and being cut off, should make us careful.

Christ's first coming brought grace, pardon, and peace, his second coming will bring the deliverance of his people from the disorder of the world. Never was there a day in which greater disorder existed in the Church than to-day. We have men doubting the good old Book, and giving their own interpretation to it, not only outside, but in their Churches, even in the very pulpit itself. And what does this all spell out? Why that the state of disorder has come. The third coming will be to the purpose of righteous rule and righteous reign, and in which we may all participate, for such honor is given to all his saints. So we see briefly what Christ himself taught.

The Lord's next coming will be to do what the first could not do. He had then no Bride, and it is of necessity that he should come as he did, and then to come for us whom he has redeemed. It will be of very great interest if we map out the occasions where he refers to his coming again. In St. Matthew's Gospel 10 : 23, where he is sending out his apostles, he says, "But when they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another: for verily I say unto you, 'ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the Son of Man be come.'"

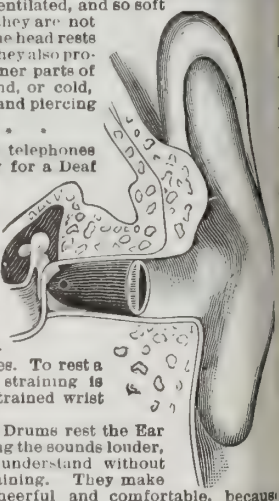
Deaf People Now Hear Whispers

Listening Machines Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but Act Like Eye-Glasses.

Ever see a pair of Listening Machines?
They make the Deaf hear distinctly.
They are so soft in the ears one can't tell the are wearing them.
And, no one else can tell either, because the are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums ar to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sight
Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just a glasses are sight-magnifiers.
They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain of them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. The can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minute just as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and off
And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, be cause they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.

* * * *



These little telephones make it as easy for a Deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing grows, because they rest up, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.

Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people can talk with their friends without the friends having to shout back at them. They can hear without straining. It is the straining that puts such a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person

* * * *

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound strike hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of spreading it weakly all over the surface. I thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struck the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ear drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves When we make the drum vibrate ten times as much we make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.

This is why people who had not in years heard a clock strike can now hear that same clock tick anywhere in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ear Drums.

Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noises in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and cured (even after Ear Doctors have given up the cases), by the use of these comfortable little ear-resters and sound-magnifiers.

A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.

Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks who were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.

Some of these very people may live near you, and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.

This book has been the means of making 326,000 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it today. Don't put off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.

Write for it today to the Wilson Ear Drum Co. 2133 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

Jesus at the Feast

By MRS. M. BAXTER

It was the last year of our Lord's ministry on earth as a man among men. He was in Galilee, "for he would not walk in Judea because the Jews sought to kill him" (John 7: 16, 18). "The Feast of Tabernacles was at hand," the last of the three great yearly feasts. At the next feast, the Passover, he should be immolated as the true Passover Lamb, in about six months' time.

His brethren, probably the sons of Joseph, who did not believe on him, sought to urge him to do things after a human pattern. They urged him to go into Judea, that his disciples might see the works that he did; that were wasted in Galilee. "If thou doest these things, show thyself to the world"; do something to make an impression. How little can men of the world understand a life regulated from above! The approval of man is their great desideratum, because God is no reality to them. Jesus gave them a characteristic answer: "My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready." Self-pleasers will not wait; but he who seeks to please God will not move until he knows he is in the will of God. "The world cannot hate you." The world cannot hate its own. The world's approval is a mark of shame for the Christian: "Ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world" (John 17:16). "But me it hateth, because I testify of it, that the works thereof are evil."

Not in the company of such, but alone with him that sent him, he went up unto the feast. But even in his absence, every-one was occupied with him. The Jews sought him at the feast with no good intent, and there were others that in secret, for fear of the Jews, discussed him. "Some said, he is a good man." Others (who were under the influence of the current theology of the day), saw him in the light of their prejudices, and said: "Nay, but he deceiveth the people." But no man dared speak openly of him, for the bitter enmity of the leaders of the people was well-known. Jesus was at the bar of public opinion before he stood at the bar of the high priest or of Herod, or of Pilate. It is so now.

Directed by his Father, he went up into the temple, about the midst of the feast, and taught. The Jews marveled. Jesus had been in no other school than the public school at Nazareth, and they said, "How knoweth this Man letters (or learning), having never learned?" Jesus answered them and said, "My teaching is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself" (John 7: 17, R.V.). Here is an important truth. The great fortress where Satan intrenches himself is a man's being, is his will. As soon as the will of an unconverted man goes over to the side of God, he readily accepts Christ as his Saviour, and the Spirit teaches him. When God has our will, he has no difficulty in saving, teaching, blessing or sanctifying us. We can only know of the doctrine as we are willing to commit ourselves to it, with no reservation.

But these Jews wanted to judge of the teaching of Christ without committing themselves; and thus it is in our day. O the heart-grief it is to us to hear our holy Lord discussed, pronounced upon, criticised, as though he were a fallible, human being! He who is from everlasting! O how we fear for those who do not hesitate, either to patronize or to condemn him, who has their breath in his hands, and who could any moment require their souls of them! How will they stand in the judgment? And now he challenges them: "Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why go ye about to kill me?"

Yet many were the searchings of heart. Some of the people of Jerusalem said, "Is not this he whom they seek to kill? But lo! he speaketh boldly, and they say nothing unto him. Do the rulers indeed know that this is the very Christ?" How strange that when at last he was condemned, none of these people stood on his side and defended him! It is such an easy thing to pronounce an opinion, but to suffer for it is quite another matter. And they salved their consciences by saying, "Well, we know where this Man came from; when Christ comes, no one will know whence he comes." It was an easy way out of the matter; they did not want to be involved in any way.

RHEUMATISM

Relieved Through the Feet

Thousands Are Being Relieved at Home Every Month by This New Discovery, Which Is Sent to Everybody to

TRY FREE--PAY WHEN SATISFIED

The son of S. J. Pearce, health officer of New Westminster, B. C., had rheumatism so badly that he couldn't walk alone. Magic Foot Drafts relieved him in a week.

Mrs. Mary Patrick, Watertown, N. Y., for more than a year couldn't get up from her chair. Magic Foot Drafts relieved her.

The Drafts relieved Z. H. Palmer of Pittsburg, Pa., who had suffered twenty-eight years.

H. C. Van Valkenburg, Providence, R. I., writes: "I don't believe any person ever had muscular rheumatism as bad as I have had it and recovered so quickly, for which I thank your Magic Foot Drafts."

Letters from the above and many thousands of other relieved patients are on file in our offices, where anyone can see them.

We want the name and address of every sufferer from rheumatism. Write us to-day. Return mail will bring you—free to try—a pair of the famous Magic Foot Drafts, the great Michigan discovery which is relieving all kinds of rheumatism, chronic or acute. If you are satisfied with the benefit received from the Drafts, send us one dollar. If not, keep your money. You decide.

The Drafts are worn on the feet because the largest pores are there; but they relieve rheumatism in every part of the body—to stay relieved—because they absorb the acid impurities from the blood through these pores, and reach the entire nervous system through the extremely sensitive nerve centers of the feet. Don't suffer needlessly, but send your name to-day to the Magic Foot Draft Co., R A 25 Majestic Bldg., Jackson, Mich. The Drafts, together with our splendid new free book on rheumatism, will come by return mail. Send no money—only your name. Write to-day.

The Great Hereafter

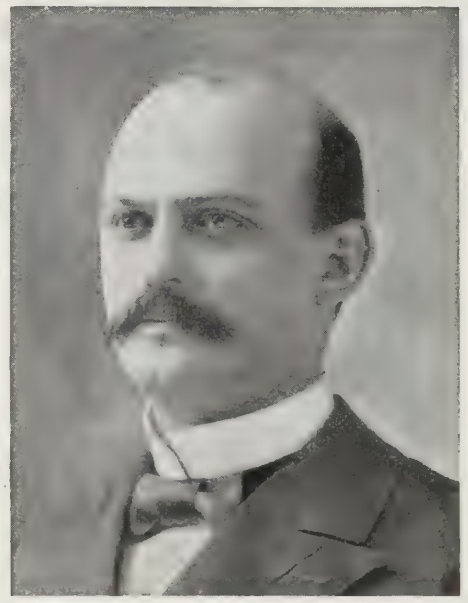
From THEODORE ROOSEVELT,

President of the United States:

"I shall read THE GREAT HEREAFTER with deep interest. I have looked over it enough to be able to tell something of its value, and it has to me the added value of knowing the life, and the strife after right, of the man who wrote it."

I believe the saints will differ in Heaven in the glorified bodies which their souls will wear, and that the characters which they make on earth will determine their eternal bodies.

THE GREAT HEREAFTER, Page 382.



REV. MADISON C. PETERS, D D.

From GROVER CLEVELAND,

Ex-President of the United States:

"THE GREAT HEREAFTER will not only have a place in my library, but will often be found in my hands, as a source of reinforcement of faith, exceedingly opportune in these days of loose thinking and careless teaching."

'Tis not a Silent Land!
Tones of harmonic spheres,
Heard not by mortal ears,
Thither their echoes roll
Into the answering soul;
Oh! 'tis a Voiceful Land!

Glimpses of the Coming World

Did He See Heaven?

IT is not often that the daily press contains sensational articles about the life hereafter, but a few days ago the newspapers related at considerable length the story of a priest, apparently in good health, who had a vision of heaven, and who died suddenly the following day.

The Other Side of Death

Such visions are not so rare as the prominence given to this occurrence would lead one to suppose. If all the exalted thoughts, the beatific insights and the death-bed glories could be gathered together, they would fill, not merely whole volumes but entire libraries.

There has been needed a book that should clarify the misty and often unhealthy notions that largely prevail in regard to the state of the righteous dead, a book not made up of the crude ideas of ignorant and superstitious people, but of the views of scholars and of the highest type of Christians.

The Great Hereafter

Such a book has indeed made its appearance. It is entitled The Great Hereafter, and is from the pen of the Rev. Madison C. Peters, D.D., the late pastor of the Bloomingdale Church, in New York City. Whether Dr. Peters has looked into heaven with his own eyes we know not, but in this substantial and handsome volume he sees, and makes his readers see, the beauties of the Cloudless Land.

It was a stupendous undertaking to bring together in one volume the views of more than four hundred of the world's greatest thinkers upon the questions of the immortality of the soul and the Great Hereafter, but Dr. Peters possesses unusual qualifications for the task. A ripe scholar, a sympathetic pastor and preacher, and an author of other works akin to the matter of this book, he has brought to bear upon his subject rare powers of heart and mind

Is Heaven a City or a Country?

Some people picture Heaven as a beautiful country, with rolling hills, winding streams, orchards of luscious fruit and meadows of living green. With others, it is a city of everlasting foundations, jasper walls and golden streets. The author of The Great Hereafter shows how these opposite conceptions may be harmonized.

The Occupations of the Blessed

"Is there any one who can carry his present employment into Heaven?" inquires a writer in a recent periodical. "The lawyer cannot, there will be no quarrels; the doctor cannot, there will be no sick; the preacher cannot, there will be no sinners." Dr. Peters explodes some false views of the subject, and gives some hints in regard to the nature of the employment in the better country.

Our Friends in the Sorrowless Land

It is a book for everybody because everybody is interested in the themes discussed. Such questions as these continually rise to our lips: Where are our dead? Shall we know our friends in heaven? What is the occupation of our loved ones in the life beyond? Do they know what is going on in this world? Can they communicate with us? Is Spiritualism a safe guide? What is the state of the soul between death and the resurrection? Are there degrees of happiness and glory in heaven? What is the nature of the resurrection body? What do the dying often see?

The Testimony of Great Men

These fascinating but difficult questions the author has undertaken to answer. He has ransacked the great libraries and questioned the master spirits of humanity, until he has knit together in one compact volume the best the world has to say upon these great themes. From Socrates to Spurgeon, from pagan philosophers to Christian preachers, the long procession moves on, each distinguished witness asserting his belief in the Great Beyond.

Shall We Wear Mourning?

The chapter on funeral customs is replete with interest. It is a collection of curious facts in connection with the burial of friends. Many good Christian people will be surprised to learn that the use of crape is a heathen custom, and not in harmony with the belief in the believers' victory over death. The author shows the marked changes which Christianity has made in funeral rites, but there are yet some needed reforms. The reader is exhorted to defy several silly social customs.

An Immortal Book

In an age of such an enormous output by the press, when the most popular book of a year is soon buried under fresher covers, it is hardly safe to predict the immortality of any work. But it is surely not too much to say, that as long as there are human griefs to be assuaged and human longings for another life, this noble book, The Great Hereafter, must find a place.

It is published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is finely illustrated, and is bound in several attractive styles.

The Inauguration Programme

Saturday's Brilliant Ceremonial — Inaugurations from Jefferson to Roosevelt

BY CHARLES M. PEPPER

THIS is the way in which President Roosevelt and Vice-President Fairbanks will be inaugurated: Months ago, two committees were appointed. One represents the people of Washington, and is known as the Citizens' Committee; the other as the Joint Committee of Congress. The Citizens' Committee looks after the hospitality of the National Capital. It provides for the entertainment of visitors, the welcoming of strangers, the decoration of the city, and many minor details.

The Presidential Inauguration of 1905, as an official function, is under the control of a committee composed of three Senators, and three members of the House of Representatives. Senator John C. Spooner of Wisconsin, is chairman of this committee. Under its direction, an order of proceedings has been adopted. The Capitol building is entirely under its control. The Diplomatic gallery of the Senate Chamber is reserved for the families of the Diplomatic Corps. The families of President Roosevelt and Vice-President Fairbanks will be given seats in a special gallery. The remaining seats in the galleries will be occupied by those fortunate enough to have Congressional friends who can procure them tickets. The proceedings will be viewed and reported from the reporters' gallery by two hundred newspaper correspondents.

Now it must be recollected, that on the 4th of March an old Congress dies and a new Congress is born; but the Senate, being a continuous body, loses only one-third of its members. It also must be remembered that Theodore Roosevelt, being already President, the ceremonies will be a little different from those that are held when a President comes into the high office fresh from private life, or from some other official position.

A little after eleven o'clock on the morning of March 4, President Roosevelt will be escorted from the White House by the Congressional Committee of Arrangements. On arriving at the Capitol, he goes directly to the President's room, close to the Senate Chamber. With him are the Senators and Representatives designated for that purpose. In the meantime, Senator Charles W. Fairbanks having tendered his resignation as a Senator, to take effect on March 4, passes directly from that position to the office of Vice-President. The Senate, of which he is a member, continues its work till noon. Then the new Senate is opened with prayer by Chaplain Hale; the new Senators are sworn in, and Mr. Fairbanks, who by virtue of his new position becomes the presiding officer of the Senate, takes the oath as Vice-President and delivers his address.

All these proceedings will be witnessed by as large a throng of distinguished persons, all of them officials, as can be crowded within the Senate chamber, as well as by the occupants of the galleries. Among the distinguished personages on the floor will be the Diplomatic Corps, including the Ambassadors from Great Britain, Russia, France, Germany, Italy, and Mexico. The Supreme Court of the United States will be present in a body, headed by the Chief Justice; also the Commanding General of the Army, the Admiral of the Navy, and other Army and Navy officers, Governors of States, and various officials, including the Cabinet. The members of the House of Representatives, headed by Speaker Cannon, will be present in a body.

When the new Senate has been organized and Vice-President Fairbanks has taken the oath, the proceedings of the day will be adjourned for the inauguration ceremonies. Meantime, Mrs. Roosevelt and other members of the President's family will be escorted to the platform on the east front of the Capitol. Then the Presidential procession will start from the Senate Chamber, through the rotunda, to the platform on the east front, the order being something like this:

The Marshal of the District of Columbia and the Marshal of the Supreme Court.
The Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court.
The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.
The Senators and Representatives composing the Committee of Arrangements.
President Roosevelt and Vice-President Fairbanks.
Members of the Senate.
The Diplomatic Corps.
The General of the Army and the Admiral of the Navy.
The Members of the Cabinet.
Members of the House of Representatives, Governors of States, and other distinguished officials.

The procession passes through the rotunda in formal order, and when the platform is reached the President takes the seat reserved for him, Chief Justice Fuller being on his right and Marshal Ramsdell, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, on the left. Then the Ambassadors, Ministers, Senators and Representatives, the officials of all classes and the distinguished persons who have been influential enough to procure seats, will be grouped in accordance with the usual arrangements. But those on the platform, although there may be two or three thousand of them, will be but a fraction of the multitude who will witness the Inaugural ceremonies. Acres of ground will be packed with enthusiastic and interested spectators—the "plain American people," who want to feel that they are part of the proceedings. For them, much of the ceremony will be only pantomime, for the crowd will extend far beyond the reach of any human voice, though many thousands can hear the President's tones.

The oath will be administered by the venerable

The DIVINE REAPER

TEXT — REVELATION 14 : 15

"The time has come for thee to reap"

"MULTITUDES, multitudes in the Valley of Decision," rescued by surrendering their hearts to Christ. Oh, what glorious news it is that reaches us from all lands telling of Old Fashioned Revivals. As in bygone days, God is visiting his people. On every hand the Holy Spirit is moving on the dull and lifeless churches, rousing apathetic Christians, and bringing thousands of sinners to the foot of the Cross. Australia has her Pentecosts. New Zealand her Pentecosts. England her Pentecosts. Rock-ribbed Scotland her Pentecost. Christmas Evans' beloved Welsh Hills have witnessed such an outpouring of the Holy Spirit as no living man has ever seen before. Rough miners and cultured scholars, old men and children, have been stirred by a mysterious power and have turned to the Lord.

Our own dear land is sharing in the blessing. Great tidal waves of revival power have rolled up from Georgia. Great tidal waves of revival power have rolled forth from Pennsylvania and New York and Colorado. Great tidal waves of revival power are now rolling forth from California to the far East. Conquering revivalists everywhere. God has harnessed to his Gospel chariots of revival fire, an Evan Roberts, a Chapman, an Ostrom, a Torrey, a Biederwolf and a Shaeffer—the soul-winner of little children—and scores of other mighty Gospel chargers in this modern work of grace. Truly, God has poured out his Spirit upon all flesh. Our sons and our daughters are prophesying. Our young men are seeing visions. Our old men are dreaming dreams. O Spirit that inspired the Wesleys and Whitefield and Finney and Baker and Cartwright and Moody, lead thou us on in this widening Gospel movement for the redemption of a sinful world for Christ.

A Widespread Revival

But though the revival spirit has appeared in many cities, I do not believe its mighty power has yet been demonstrated to a greater degree anywhere than in our own beloved city of Los Angeles. Here, for the past few weeks, we have seen many public buildings at the same hour crowded with anxious seekers after Jesus Christ. These buildings were thronged on Sundays. Yes. But they have also been thronged on week nights. They have also been thronged at twelve o'clock noon, as well as twelve o'clock at midnight. They have also been thronged in the mornings and in the afternoons. Everywhere Christian people have been reconsecrating their lives to their Saviour. Everywhere, like the ancient Philippian jailer, anxious men and women have been asking the modern Pauls and Silases: "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" Everywhere, gray-haired old folks, broad-chested men, and women in the prime of life, and agile-limbed, clear-eyed youths and maidens, have been praying for salvation; multitudes have arisen in the public meetings, asking prayers for their mothers and fathers, their sisters and brothers, their children and their friends.

What is the meaning of all this wonderful manifestation of the Spirit's power? Is there any law not yet discovered, that governs such movements? Is it possible, that in the spiritual world as in the natural world, there is a close connection between cause and effect? Is there anything that we as individual Christians can do to bring into operation these life-giving showers of divine grace? Is it possible that if we, as Christian people, continue to obey God's laws, we can have a perpetual revival of divine grace in our churches and homes every morning, every noon, and every night?

Before paying a grateful tribute to the great evangelistic leaders who organized this Los Angeles revival, I would acknowledge with sincere reverence our debt to the inconspicuous Christians, who, day by day for months, besought God for this season of blessing. The religious and the secular newspapers have been giving column after column of space, in recounting what the consecrated evangelists have been doing for Christ. Thousands of sinners in their meetings have signed the cards pledging themselves in Christ's strength to lead a Christian life. The pictures of J. Wilbur Chapman and Henry Ostrom, and W. E. Biederwolf and others, have been scattered broadcast in hundreds of homes. But I am sure I voice their convictions when I tell you that this great ingathering of souls is not due to their efforts. They have been merely the instruments used of God to reap the harvest which comes primarily from the Holy Spirit's operations. It is the work of God, in answer to the pleading of Christian men and women who spent night after night in prayer, before the welcome train brought our beloved brethren from their Pittsburg, Birmingham, Atlanta, and Denver Armageddons. They met night after night, and week after week, until at last the Spirit came as it did on the little company in the upper chamber at Jerusalem.

The Work of the Spirit

Brethren, the marvelous sights we have witnessed in Los Angeles during the last few weeks are not the work of any human agency, but of God. Those were the results of faith—the faith that moves mountains. When God's people pleaded with him for this blessing, they put their trust in One who never fails. The preparation in the heart of man is with the Lord, and when these believing men and women begged him to touch the hearts of the people, he heard and answered them. The earnest appeals of Dr. Chapman and Mr. Biederwolf would have found no response in the hearts of those men whom we saw arise in the men's meeting in Hazard's Pavilion, if it had not been that a mightier power than man's had been at work in them. If we want a revival to move a city, we must get that revival by the "Golden Tongue" of earnest prayer. We shall never get it simply by the "Silver Tongue" of brilliant speech. Prayer, prayer, agonizing prayer, prayer which came from hundreds and thousands of anxious fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters and husbands and wives was the cause, the chief cause, of the Los Angeles revival.

The same lesson was taught us by the movement led by Campbell Morgan a year ago. After the great English preacher had left the Pacific Coast, the Ministerial Union of this city met to discuss the results of those meetings. One clergyman after another discussed the causes of that awakening, but no solution was found. I confessed my own inability to understand it, for I had heard Campbell Morgan in the East, when he did not seem to have any such influence over men. Yet the sermons which were powerless there, were practically the same sermons that were fruitful here. With that the Nestor of the congregational ministers arose; good old loving Dr. Warren F. Day. He said: "Brethren, you have omitted to state the chief reason of Campbell Morgan's success in Los Angeles. It was due to the fact that hundreds and thousands of Christians paved the way for his success by weeks of earnest prayer. The Christians prayed in their churches; they prayed in their cottage prayer-meetings; they prayed everywhere!" "Amen," said I. "Dr. Day is right." Campbell Morgan's revival was due chiefly to the fact that those meetings were lifted up to heaven by thousands of pleading, praying Christians. J. Wilbur Chapman, when he reaches heaven, will see there many saved during this Los Angeles revival. But the old mother in Israel; the old Christian elder and deacon; the old Christian church member will rejoice with him in this harvest. Christ from his throne will recognize their services. "You wondered," he will say to the evangelists, "why it was that your words so moved the sinner to seek salvation. It was in answer to the prayers of these humble Christians that the Holy Spirit touched the hearts of your hearers so that the good seed fell into good ground." Let us thank God for such prayers.

Brought to Decision

The Los Angeles revival teaches another great lesson. The vast number of people do not have to be taught who Christ is. They know enough about the Gospel of salvation to be saved if they will. They must be led by the power of the Holy Spirit, simply to make a stand; to come to a decision; to do what they know they ought to do. They do not need to hear sermons on the authenticity of the Scriptures, the divinity of Christ, or the doctrine of original sin. They are for the greater part believers in Christianity. It is the personal appropriation of these truths that they lack. They love sin so much that they will not come to the desired decision. In other words, they believe, but they do not wish to give up sin. It is not information about Christ, nor explanation of the truths of Christianity that men need. They understand these things already. It is the will that must be captured. They do not realize their danger, nor t they must themselves seek salvation through Chr The sermons preached by the evangelists proved t fact.

The city was mapped out into sections. Then different Protestant churches, irrespective of cre united in one central church of their respective distri Thus the rich and the poor, the educated and uneduc ed, pastors as well as people, had the Bread of I broken unto them. And how did these evangel break the Bread of Life? They gave their Gos message in the simplest language, first taking it granted that all men believed in the divine personal of Jesus. And when the invitation was given to co to Christ, men and women arose by the scores and oft by the hundreds, and came. Ministerial friends, Chi tian friends, we as a class, spend too much time proving that Christ is, rather than that Christ should accepted. It is to bring them to public decision Christ, which men already know they ought to mal that is the chief work of the Christian messengers.

But another mighty lesson is pressed upon our hea by this series of meetings. That is this: The Lor work is a business. It is not a hysteria. It is no few holy ejaculations. It is not lifting your he above the clouds so that the mists blind your eyes a chill your enthusiasm for practical duty on earth. is not a few spasms and a few temporary Gospel gy nastics. It is a business—a business which we shou study carefully, and plan systematically and press str uously with all our faith and energy.

Value of Organization

When these evangelists began their work, as far human agency was concerned, they had almost a perfe system of machinery. Dr. R. A. Walton was the a vance agent who taught us how to perfect this machi ery. First, the meetings were systematically and co pletely advertised. Secondly, all the workers of district were gathered together under one hea Some went into the choruses. Then other worke were detailed to certain sittings. Every three or fo pews had their overseers, or Gospel sentinels. N sooner was a hand raised for prayer, than a Christi worker was by that person's side to lead him or her Christ.

Then, not satisfied with all this, one night Gener J. Wilbur Chapman—for he is a general of men—ma shaled all his forces for a grand charge upon the cit dels of sin. That night the Christian evangelists a their followers came from all over the city. Down in the saloons and the places of evil resorts they wer Everywhere the right hand of a Christian brother sister was extended. Everywhere a pleading voice sa to sinners, "Come, we want you for Christ." The valiant soldiers of the Cross did not wait for sinners come to the Gospel banquet. They literally follow out the command of Jesus, which said, "Go ye out in the highways and the hedges and compel them to con in that my house may be filled." And come they di They came by the hundreds and the thousands. Th drunkards, the libertines, the outcasts, they came. O how they longed to come! Can any one who witnesse that wonderful and inspiring meeting in the Gran Opera House of Los Angeles, February 3, 1905, ev forget the revelation? Many faces were scarre and seared with the awful marks of sin. All, wheth outcasts or rescuers, were anxious about souls—anxio about their own souls, or about the souls of other Some curiosity-seekers may have come to that meetin to scoff, but nearly all, before they left, prayed as th poor Publican prayed. There were tears—penite tears—which welled up from breaking hearts. Ye those tears were glorious tears, flowing unbidden an unchecked. Four thousand men and women, many o them criminals, gathered together in the midnight hou during the tempest, to seek Christ. Did you ever se or hear the like of it? Can any one who witnessed tha wonderful and transporting meeting in the Grand Oper House of Los Angeles, ever forget the revelation? We we not then taught how Christ wants us to go forth int the highways and the hedges, seeking sinful men an women wherever they may be found?

One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, tolled the cit bells. The evangelists and their followers worked on ne, ten, half-past ten—the Christian disciples worked . Eleven, twelve, went the clock. What! Is any e out to-night? Oh, yes, the messengers of sin are t to-night. This is the harvest-hour for the Demons Death. But to-night, ay to-night, the Angels of ercy are calling and pleading. Mothers and fathers heaven, wives and children in heaven, over the em- ttlements did ye not see the prayers being answered the midnight hour? Oh, God, teach us, as these angelists have taught us, that the mission of a Chris- n church is not alone to care for a few people who e our social equals, and who happen to come to our urches. The greatest mission of Christian churches to go after men and women—to go after them in loons, in haunts of sin, in gambling dens, everywhere d anywhere. To go after them in the morning, at on and at midnight.

Denominationalism Eliminated

But, lastly, I learn from the work of these evangelists, lesson which ought to make us one and all ashamed ourselves. If the churches of the Lord Jesus Christ ould join together their forces to make a conquest for hrist, they could win the same triumphs for the Master, ar in and year out. The mightiest mission of J. Wilbur hapman and his associates is to unite Christ's forces. hey have given us an object lesson of the victory that ay be won by the united effort of all the denominations. Supposing every fall the Congregational ministers, and e Baptist ministers, and the Methodist ministers, and the ampbellite ministers, and the Presbyterian ministers, nd the Lutheran ministers, and the Reformed min- ters, would all get together. Then, supposing they ould say, "Let us join in sections. We will exchange ulpits. We will preach for souls, no matter in what hurch we preach. We will have our cottage prayer meetings and our noon-day prayer meetings. We will send our best men down into the slums." What would happen? Not only would they break down sectarian lines, but they would teach congregations that the mightiest business on earth is not to build up a denomination, but to save immortal souls. They would do just what Dr. Chapman and his associates have done. They would shake the cities and the States from centre to circumference.

One of the most far-seeing acts Dr. Chapman ever did for the advancement of a Gospel movement was to combine evangelists of different ecclesiastical denominations into a unit for the spreading of the Gospel. Dr. Chapman is a Presbyterian, and is laboring under the orders of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. Dr. Henry Ostrum, his associate, is a Methodist; Tilman Hobson is a Quaker; Rev. R. W. Stough is a Congregationalist; R. A. Walton belongs to the Southern Presbyterian Church—here there was no Northern and Southern churches—John K. Elliott is a Dutch Reformed minister. All sectarian fences have been burned in these evangelistic meetings. Why cannot we do the same every year as Gospel ministers? Let us have a forward movement. Yes, but also a united movement for Christ.

All Under One Flag

Every sectarian minister wants to hoe in his own ecclesiastical row, whereas, in fact and in truth, there is but little difference in these rows. They all end in having their sheaves of wheat deposited at the foot of the Cross. Why cannot we work hand in hand with other Christian denominations? Are we not all servants of Christ? The Presbyterian differs in doctrine from the Methodist; the Congregationalist differs in church government from the Episcopalian, but all give the same answer to the question, "What must I do to be saved?" Every evangelical denomination points the sinner to Christ as the one and only source of salvation. Love, Gospel love, ought to make us all one. O, for Gospel forces united and welded together. O, that the Churches of all the Protestant denominations might enter into a concerted and single-purposed movement for Christ, as was done in this great Gospel campaign.

Blessed Evangelism

I cannot close without an expression of gratitude to the evangelists who have aided us. I honor all evangelists. Do we realize how much these evangelists give up for their work? All the joys of home life, all the sweet fellowship with their people that the regular minister enjoys—these must all be surrendered by the evangelist, who goes from city to city to arouse and stimulate the churches. Dr. Walton told me that for ten years the only home he had has been a trunk. Let us honor such men, who devote themselves to the public service. The Church of Christ benefits by their labors and too often it forgets the hardships they undergo.

I want you to pray for God's evangelists. Pray for them when, tired and fatigued, they go to their lonely rooms in a hotel. Pray for Dr. R. A. Torrey and Mr. Alexander far, far away from home. Pray for these friends, Dr. Chapman and his associates, who are now going up and down the land, who have lately been among us. May their joy be the peace that passeth all understanding. May their happiness be gained from the fact that they are winning many, many souls for Christ. God bless the evangelists, who are saving men and women for Christ. God bless the Gospel evangelists, that they may teach us gladly to do the Father's will, whether it be like Paul in far-off Macedonia, or in our home Tarsus, "which is no mean city."

Lived to See Her 104th Birthday

RACHEL MARTENSE AT THIRTY

THE OLD MARTENSE HOMESTEAD AND "AUNT RACHEL'S GARDEN"

MISS MARTENSE IN HER 103d YEAR

IN a bulky, leather-covered, brass-clasped Bible is the record of the birth of Rachel Martense, on February 2, 1801. The book was printed in Amsterdam, in 1618, by Marcus Doornick, the text being in Holland Dutch. This Bible is one of the most treasured relics of the Martense family, who were among the earliest settlers of Long Island, and who owned many acres in that part of Brooklyn now known as Flatbush.

Rachel was the daughter of Adrian I. Martense and Deborah Berry. Her mother inherited, when a girl, a large estate from her grandfather. These lands descended in line to Rachel, who was in many respects a remarkable woman, not only because of her great age and Christian character, but also because of the interest she always took in life, even to the very last, for she did not long survive her 104th birthday, but passed peacefully away on February 14th, like a tired child falling asleep.

She had been ill with bronchitis for several weeks, but believed that she would live to celebrate her birthday. For many years it had been the custom of the people of Flatbush to honor their townswoman's natal day, and this year was to be no exception.

The usual reception was held, but Miss Martense was unable to be present, and was confined to her bed in the back parlor of the old mansion on Linden Avenue. Children from the Sunday Schools, and pupils from the Erasmus High School, of which Miss Martense was a graduate in 1815, gathered at her home with birthday gifts and flowers. A large life-size oil portrait of Miss Martense, painted when she was in the early thirties, was placed in the centre of the drawing-room, where the great dark eyes met the glances of the children with a soft, kindly gaze. The pictured face was a pretty one, surrounded by glossy black ringlets, short and coquettish, while the dark gown and dainty trimmings of white lace gave an air of our quaint, old-time fashions, harking back to the early part of the last century. Before her last illness enfeebled her, Miss Martense delighted in telling the children of the time when she was a little girl. She recalled the tales of her grandfather, who was thirty-five years old at the time of the revolution, and who told her among other things, how the British soldiers camped in the fields, just back of the Martense farm.

For more than ninety years, Miss Martense was a member of the old Dutch Reformed Church of Flatbush, and she was always very active in church and charitable work. Her early home was in the fine old farm-house still standing on Church Avenue, and many of the fruit trees on the farm were grafted by her hands. "Aunt Rachel's" flower-garden was one of the show-places of the neighborhood. Gardening at ninety must have been arduous work; but even after that age she would sit on a low box, and weed and transplant, to the amazement of those who saw her. The old lady attributed her long life to having always lived much in the open air, and to her good appetite. She used to laugh heartily over letters from people anxious for longevity, asking if she lived on any specially prepared foods or drinks, and her invariable reply was that she had always eaten what she liked, and plenty of it. For the last few years she lived with her nephew, Joseph S. Story, whom she always called her "boy," even after he had passed his sixtieth birthday. He was devoted in his kindly care of "Aunt Rachel."

With reverent fingers, Mr. Story unfolded and showed to the writer a little package, which had been treasured many years, and which contained among other papers, a "Reward of Merit," on which was pictured in wood engraving, some astonishing figures, labeled "Opossum," "Spoon-bill," "Sea-horse" and "Heron," while a no less astonishing group of ringletted boys and girls, in the quaintest dress, illuminated the top of the document, under which were these words:

> This certifies that Rachel Martense, by close application and attention, has for six weeks excelled her class, and receives this as a testimony of the esteem and approbation of her teacher. Signed A. NEAL.
> April. 2. 1815.

In the sitting-room, where "Aunt Rachel" always received her callers, and where her beloved pastor often prayed with her, stands a tall "Grandfather's Clock," just one year older than its former owner. Faithfully and well the old clock does its work, keeping as good time as when, 106 years ago, it was brought on a farm wagon from "Watchmaker Van Wyck, of 275 Pearl Street, four doors east of Beekman Slip, New York."

Many paintings upon the walls of the old Story mansion, done by the hand of Miss Martense, show that she was talented with the brush. She was also an accomplished musician and expert needlewoman She was gentle, charitable, and humane, and loved to do good in secret. At one time she traveled quite extensively; but most of her life has been spent in the old town where she was born, and where she was loved for her consistent Christian life and kind-heartedness. She is sincerely mourned by many whom she had quietly and unostentatiously befriended.

CABINET LADIES WHO WILL BE PROMINENT IN THE SOCIAL SIDE OF THE INAUGURATION

Chief Justice Fuller. The President's Inaugural Address may be heard by perhaps five thousand people, but hundreds of thousands will read it in the newspapers within an hour after its delivery.

At the conclusion of the ceremonies, the members of the Senate, the Vice-President, and the Speaker and members of the House of Representatives re-enter the Capitol building, while President Roosevelt, accompanied by the Congressional Committee of Arrangements, proceeds to the White House. This really is the great event of the Inauguration, for it gives the opportunity for hundreds of thousands of persons to see the President. Pennsylvania Avenue is one of the finest avenues in the world for a great parade. Its sides become packed and lined with solid humanity. The President's carriage, of course, will be surrounded by a guard of honor. Then will form the great procession with Grand Marshals, and Marshals, and aides, and a vast number of assistants. There will be squadrons of cavalry, troops of infantry, detachments of National Guard and other militia organizations, cadets from West Point and Annapolis, marines, sailors, and a vast number of civic organizations. President Roosevelt's old comrades from among the Rough Riders will be there. The Marine Band and scores of others will play inspiring strains.

After the Presidential escort proper, will come companies from the National Guard of New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Virginia. Then come Governors of States and Territories, accompanied by their staffs; and after this cadets, midshipmen, a battalion of engineers, a company of the Signal Corps, a regiment of infantry, a regiment of the Coast Artillery, a battalion of the Porto Rico regiment, a battalion of the Philippine Scouts, a brigade of U. S. seamen, a squadron of the 7th Cavalry, a brigade of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, and then again companies from the militia of the different States. But the pageantry will not be wholly military. Between forty and fifty civic organizations may be represented in the parade, including political clubs, various societies, college students from all over the United States, and a large number of private citizens.

President Roosevelt, on reaching the White House a little in advance of the procession, will be enabled to get a little rest and perhaps take a light lunch. Then he goes to the reviewing stand which has been erected in the White House grounds. A thousand distinguished persons will be gathered on this reviewing stand. Across the avenue in Layfayette Park, another reviewing stand will hold 2,000 persons. The parade defiles before the President in review for hours, and not till after sunset does the last military organization, and the last group of plain citizens pass in review, and pay their respects to President Theodore Roosevelt.

Vice-President Fairbanks

Next in order comes the Inaugural Reception in the great Pension Building, often miscalled the Inaugural Ball. The interior of this magnificent building lends itself to electrical effects, color, and floral decorations, as does no other structure in the National Capital. On this occasion, it will be a scene of splendor and brilliancy rarely equaled. By midnight all will be over, for the Sabbath will be at hand. The President returns to the White House for repose, and then for a Sunday of rest, worship and calm reflection on the great responsibilities of the next four years, and the heartiness with which the American people had speeded him on his task.

Chief Justice Fuller
Who will Administer the Oath of Office

FROM JEFFERSON TO ROOSEVELT

THE first inauguration of a President in Washington was that of Thomas Jefferson, in 1801. There will be very old persons at President Roosevelt's inauguration, members of the Oldest Inhabitants' Association, who saw Thomas Jefferson in his old age. One of these is William W. Buth, in his ninety-seventh year, who recollects seeing the wife of President Madison feed her favorite parrot. There will be some present, too, who saw Madison and Monroe, and John Adams is still within living memory. Chaplain Edward Everett Hale, who opens the Senate proceedings with prayer when Vice-President Fairbanks is sworn in, has seen nearly all the Presidents.

But the popular idea of inaugurating a President dates from Andrew Jackson's time. That was the first demonstration of the people, whose idol "Old Hickory" was. It is said that when Jackson was first inaugurated, on March 4, 1829, the crowd which witnessed the ceremony was "enormous," fully 10,000, the newspapers of that day declared.

To witness President Roosevelt's inauguration the railways bring to the National Capital 200,000 visitors. They would bring more if their facilities permitted. Probably 200,000 people who live in the District of Columbia also will see the inauguration. That is th difference in the nation's growth in three-quarters a century—10,000 to see a President inaugurated i 1829, and 400,000 in 1905.

A few persons will see President Roosevelt take th oath who have witnessed the same ceremony every fou years since Jackson's time. They have seen Jackso escorting his successor Martin Van Buren; Williai Henry Harrison, riding in the open carriage whic caused him to catch the cold from which he died month later; Abraham Lincoln taking the oath i the deepest solemnity that ever shadowed a nation Grant in the open air when the thermometer wa below zero; Garfield saluting his aged mother firs of all, and McKinley beaming on his aged mothe too, while she watched him round out the caree and confirm her faith that he one day would b President.

One of those who sees President Roosevelt inaugu rated is Judge Edgar H. Bates, of Brooklyn. Judg Bates is eighty-seven years of age. As a ver small boy it is probable that he saw President Jame Monroe, for he lived near Washington and wa brought by his parents to the city. He know that as a lad of seven he witnessed John Quinc Adams inaugurated, and years afterward, when Mr Adams was a member of Congress, he often watche him swimming in the Potomac River. Judge Bate remembers the visit of General Lafayette to th United States. He recalls the inauguration o Andrew Jackson in 1829, when a feast was provide for the ten thousand spectators, at which the big gest cheese that was ever known was served as par of the repast. Judge Bates saw James Madison a a Fourth of July celebration in 1836.

Going back to Andrew Jackson's time again, i is another illustration of how young the country is, when some of the public men who will assis at President Roosevelt's inauguration are name as having been born during that period. There is a really wonderful group which gathers in the Senate chamber while the Vice-President is sworn in.

Thus the nation is benefited by the wisdom which comes with age and mature experience in the public service. But it also has youth and vigor, for many of those holding public positions who take part in the inaugural ceremonies, were born in Lincoln's time and since. There are members of the House of Representatives under thirty years, so that they go back only to Grant's time, and there are several of the United States Senators who were born during Lincoln's administration, among them Beveridge of Indiana, and Bailey of Texas.

President Roosevelt's cabinet, too, will have representation both of Andrew Jackson's time, and of Lincoln's time. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, and Ethan Hitchcock, Secretary of the Interior, were born in 1835, and are of the Jackson epoch. Our prospective Postmaster-General, Geo. B. Cortelyou, was born in 1862, so that he is of Lincoln's time.

Our "Uncrowned Queen" in Marble

ON the seventh anniversary of the death of Frances E. Willard, February 17, a fine memorial statue of the "Uncrowned Queen" and founder of the W. C. T. U., was unveiled in Washington, and accepted by Congress as the gift of Illinois to the nation.

Each State is entitled, through a provision of the United States Congress, to place two statues in Statuary Hall in the National Capitol. It is not stipulated that these statues shall be of men; but Illinois is the first State to place the statue of a woman there. The bill passed by the Illinois legislature providing for the statue, in its preamble paid a high tribute to Miss Willard as:

"The author, organizer and advocate of purity and temperance, Illinois' most illustrious deceased citizen, Frances E. Willard, the uncrowned queen of purity and temperance, whose ashes repose in place on the shores of Lake Michigan, at Evanston, Ill. Her life, like that of her Redeemer, was devoted to the spiritual welfare of mankind, and the world at large has been materially benefited by her prayers and sacrifices. Radiant with a halo of all the virtues, her face shone with the light of intelligence. Her marvelous abilities energized all around and about her, while her gentleness, tact and self-sacrificing spirit calmed every storm that rose in the councils which were graced and blessed by her presence. Her grand life is a "beacon light" to the good and the true of all sexes, races and creeds in the civilized world, and her wonderful achievements are lights and landmarks on the cliffs of fame, which will for all time illumine the paths of millions of women wherever civilization finds a footing, which is where woman is duly appreciated."

The commissioners were authorized to expend not to exceed nine thousand dollars in purchasing a heroic bronze or marble statue of Miss Willard, and to provide a pedestal. The bill was passed with practical unanimity, and was promptly signed by the Governor.

The ceremony of accepting the statue by Congress took place in the Senate, in charge of Senator Shelby M. Cullom of Illinois. He was the first speaker, and was followed by Senators Beveridge of Indiana, Dolliver of Iowa and Hopkins of Illinois. The ceremony in the House of Representatives was in charge of Hon. George E. Foss of Illinois; addresses were made by Hon. Chas. E. Littlefield of Maine, and Hon. Henry Boutell of Illinois.

The galleries were thronged with members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union from many different States, and by other friends of temperance.

On Saturday, February 18, one thousand school children of Washington passed through Statuary Hall, each placing a flower at the base of the statue in recognition of Miss Willard's appreciation of childhood as a factor in the world's betterment. A medal was given by the hand of Miss Anna A. Gordon to each boy and girl in the procession, the medals bearing on one side a representation of the statue, and on the other the inscription: "Presented by the State of Illinois, February XVII, MCMV."

As to the statue itself, it is of the purest white Carrara marble, a little more than life-size, and represents Miss Willard as addressing an audience. On the pedestal, which is of Vermont marble, the following words from Miss Willard are engraved:

Ah, it is women who have given the costliest hostages to fortune. Out into the battle of life they have sent their best beloved with fearful odds against them. Oh, by the dangers they have dared; by the hours of patient watching over beds where helpless children lay; by the incense of ten thousand prayers wafted from their gentle lips to heaven, I charge you give them power to protect along life's treacherous highway those whom they have so loved.

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Illinois further showed her appreciation of woman, in the selection of Miss Helen Farnsworth Mears of Wisconsin, to execute the statue. She is a pupil of Augustus St. Gaudens, and has also studied in Europe. St. Gaudens says of her work on Miss Willard's statue: "It shows, in a way that seems to me only a woman could do, the union of strength with feminine gentleness—a quality most tender and elusive, but which she has certainly infused in her work."

Miss Mears' work on Miss Willard's statue has not been without perplexities, as the first block of marble developed a flaw when much had already been done upon it; the same happened with the second block of marble. But the third block is without blemish, like the noble woman it represents.

"LEW" WALLACE AND HIS WORK

GEN. "LEW" WALLACE

BY the death of Gen. Lewis Wallace, who passed away at Crawfordville, Ind., the fifteenth of last month, America lost one of her foremost citizens, and a gallant soldier; the world of letters one of its most eminent pens. For, in a literary sense, Lew Wallace did not belong to this country alone. His works have been translated into many tongues, and the fame of the author of Ben Hur has been increasing, until there is hardly a country that has not heard of his remarkable tale of the Christ.

Ben Hur was first published twenty-five years ago, and for a year or two made little stir among the reading public. A far different beginning from the popular novels of to-day, that, widely advertised, run to a hundred thousand copies, and are forgotten in twelve months. The sale of the book grew gradually, until, ten years ago, it ranked as one of the "best selling," a position that it still maintains.

Although he was the author of a number of notable works, The Fair God, The Boyhood of Christ, and The Prince of India; his fame rests on Ben Hur. Its popularity is confined to no one class of readers. It has been admired and praised by literary men in England and America, and read by thousands of people who consider the time ordinarily spent in novel reading as worse than wasted. He was an exact and painstaking writer. Dealing almost exclusively with historical subjects, he studied every detail, so that a person reading one of his stories can be confident that landscape and costume have been accurately described. Every part of his work was gone over again and again, until he had satisfied himself, and Lew Wallace was his own severest critic. The Fair God was ten years in preparation, Ben Hur seven, and The Prince of India three. On the last he worked more steadily than on the others, and three to four years might be taken as a fair average.

Taking great pleasure in his work, there was nothing of the contract writer in his make up. If other writers who are disposed to criticise his productions would take one half the pains, we should have fewer stories and more literature.

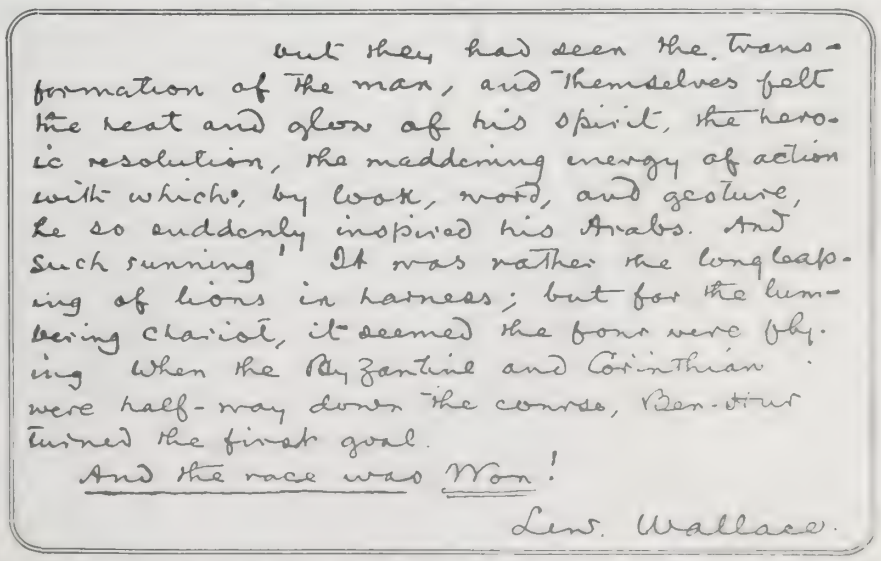
President Garfield had great admiration for Wallace's literary ability. When he appointed him the United States Minister to Turkey, he wrote across the corner of his commission the words "Ben Hur." As General Wallace left the President, Garfield put his hand on the author's shoulder and said: "Now you will have time to write another story. Why not lay it in Constantinople?" This suggestion resulted in the publication, over ten years later, of The Prince of India.

The great reason for the success of Ben Hur, is the fact that its author approached the most sacred event of all the ages in a spirit of reverence. Any one who has read the beautiful passages of the meeting of "The Wise Men" in the desert, and the "shepherds who watched their flocks by night," cannot doubt this. And if one wants to get the essence of Christianity in three pages, let him read the account of the first meeting between Hur and the Son of Mary. This last has been considered by Irving Bacheller, one of the most beautiful descriptions in literature, and his opinion is indeed well founded.

It has been objected that he wrote in the "grand style." He did, but you cannot write a tale dealing with the greatest characters in history, as you would some dialect episode in an obscure village. If he followed somewhat the style of the age of Scott, we are sure that he could have chosen no better model.

When he wished, he could make his work of the most thrilling character, as, for example, the scenes on the Roman galleys, and the great chariot race, that has been the stand-by of American schoolboys in recitation for the last fifteen years. It is only good work that will stand the wear that has been given to Ben Hur. Surely, Hohenlinden, and parts of the Lady of the Lake and Marmion are no less great because they find a place in the school readers.

There are certain people to whom is given an earthly immortality, on account of great works done. One need not be endowed with the gift of prophecy to say that Lew Wallace is one of these.



but they had seen the transformation of the man, and themselves felt the heat and glow of his spirit, the heroic resolution, the maddening energy of action with which, by look, word, and gesture, he so suddenly inspired his Arabs. And such running! It was rather the long leaping of lions in harness; but for the lumbering chariot, it seemed the four were flying. When the Rhyzantine and Corinthian were half-way down the course, Ben-Hur turned the first goal.

And the race was Won!

Lew. Wallace.

Instant in Prayer

"AS I grow older," writes a reader of this journal, "the habit of prayer grows more and more upon me. I find it a necessity and a comfort to pray, not daily, but unceasingly. A simple petition for guidance and strength rises to my lips spontaneously many times every day, and I feel that every prayer reinvigorates and encourages me. Is this a general experience, or is it confined to a few? Is it the result of advancing age and consequent feebleness? Or is it an indication of the development of the spiritual nature?"

We believe the question asked by our correspondent is one that arises frequently in many minds. Progress in the spiritual life brings us nearer to God. We grow more and more into the habit of daily dependence upon Him, and we desire above all things a more perfect conformity in our own hearts to His will. We become more childlike in the simplicity of our faith, and in our whole attitude toward our Heavenly Father. We realize as never before the divine influence guiding and moulding our lives, as we seek to commit all our ways to Him, and to follow the divine counsel and leadings. In a word—we seek a "closer walk with God."

It is a beautiful thing when, as the years slip past, we find ourselves drawn into this nearer relationship. The world no longer absorbs us; it ceases to dominate our thoughts. The great prizes of earthly struggle for which so many are striving, appear in their true character, and in their right perspective, and we no longer place a false valuation upon them. We discover that, after all, fame, riches, honor, power, social position, and much that we held dear, are but transitory and unsatisfying phases of life, and that the real prize, which lies far beyond them, is to be found in that divine peace which comes to the heart that is in harmony with the will of God and yielding Him implicit trust and obedience. We begin, moreover, to know what it means to follow Jesus, and to grasp the meaning of that marvelous promise of a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering Father to all who, living in such spiritual union, offer their petitions in Jesus' name.

So, as we grow older, and as the spiritual vision becomes clearer, we see that prayer is, of a truth, the shining ladder that unites earth and heaven, and that every prayer from the heart brings us a step higher. We see then, as we never could have seen in the earlier years, that a prayerless life is barren of all real and enduring happiness. Such a life voluntarily excludes itself from the grandest possibilities and the purest enjoyments, that are the privilege of those who live near to God in prayer.

The Arbitration Treaties

THERE has been a great deal of discussion and no little feeling in the public press lately, over the action of the United States Senate in the matter of the arbitration and reciprocity treaties. These treaties were to be concluded between our own government and the governments of Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, Norway, and Sweden.

For a year or more, our State Department has been busily arranging a basis of mutual arbitration with these seven governments. It was a work of the greatest skill, and its influence, when completed, could not fail to benefit not ourselves alone, but a great portion of the civilized world. Our government has been a recognized leader in this peace movement, and has won the cordial support of all the Powers interested in the general plan proposed. In their original form as prepared by our State Department, the treaties provided that matters proper for arbitration should be made the subjects of special "agreements" between the United States and the individual governments interested, and should then be submitted to adjudication by an International Commission. They were treaties such as European governments have made with each other, and were strictly according to the rules laid down by the Hague Peace Convention.

In every case, the form of the original treaty was submitted to the government in interest and approved. This was the condition of the treaties when they were submitted to the Senate. That body deemed it proper to amend the originals, so that every arbitration should be conducted, not under a simple working "agreement," but under a full-fledged treaty. This the Senate did, because, as Mr. Spooner explains, "it could not, under the Constitution, by ratifying these treaties, lend its functions and powers to the Executive so that he can make special agreements without reference to the Senate."

But we must leave to constitutional authorities the task of settling the controversy. That the course of the Senate in amending the treaties will be detrimental or disastrous to the cause of peace and arbitration, we cannot believe. It can only mean a delay which, with a clearer understanding of the question, might have been avoided. A good cause is strengthened by opposition, but we cannot believe that there is in either House of Congress any real antagonism to the treaties. Even though they should be withdrawn, the friends of arbitration need not fear lest the cause of peace should suffer. Arbitration will come. This nation has set its face peace-ward. There are many eloquent voices in both Houses that will be raised at the proper moment, to express the real thought of the American people, and set us right before the world. There will be no national stultification on this question. Though the ways of legislation and diplomacy are somewhat slow and occasionally hard to understand, as long as our people and their representatives in Congress are sound on the main question, there can be no reasonable doubt as to the issue.

The Willard Statue

THE latest addition to the national Pantheon in Washington, a picture of which appears on another page, has a significance that should not be overlooked. The statue of Frances E. Willard, placed by the State of Illinois in the Hall of Statuary, is a tribute to noble womanhood, that honors the State as it honors the gifted woman whom it immortalizes. Congress has limited the privilege of thus canonizing citizens to two from each State. That the great State of Illinois should have used one of its privileges to honor a woman, is a mark of singular favor.

The visitor to this Hall of Fame, in years to come, will naturally be surprised to see the statue of a woman among those of the statesmen and warriors whose memory the country cherishes. "Who was she?" he will ask. "What was there in her person or life that gave her title to such honor?" The Greeks revered personal beauty, but it was not that. Aristocratic nations paid homage to high birth and lineage, but it was not that. France has immortalized her Joan of Arc, but this gentle woman was no warrior. Why then is her statue here? She loved and served her people—that is the explanation. She was a simple, earnest, devoted woman, who consecrated her life and her great powers to the redemption of the nation from a moral curse. Her aim was high. She knew that she would never attain it; but she was content to labor on, gaining step by step in the long struggle, hoping that after her life was ended others would continue the work, until at last her country was delivered from its bondage to alcohol. That is why her statue stands among those of illustrious men. In the words of the old Book, "So shall it be done unto one whom the King delighteth to honor."

The Virtue of Forgiveness

NO duty is insisted upon more earnestly in the New Testament than that of forgiveness. Love your enemies; do good to them that hate you; pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you, are the commandments of Jesus, in harmony with his own amazing spirit of love, that on the cross prompted him to cry, in behalf of his murderers, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do."

Even harder than to forgive an enemy, is it to forgive a friend from whom we are estranged.

Love, when at feud, turns to most malignant hate. A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city. In view of this, our Lord tells us, if we have a quarrel against any one, to settle it first and amicably, before going to the temple to engage in our devotions. First be reconciled to thy brother, then come and offer thy gift. If, indeed, the gift has been brought to the altar, and the heart is cold, and hard, and dark with anger and disdain, the gift will not be accepted. Leave there thy gift, and seek thy brother, and let the differences be made up; let peace replace conflict; let the home and the heart be purged of the evil leaven of malice and uncharitableness.

So high a value does Jesus place on the forgiving temper that it would seem as if, lacking it, one could not be a true disciple. How often shall my brother sin against me, Lord, and I forgive him? asked one of the little band who went up and down the Holy Land with Him who came from heaven. With lightning quickness came the reply, "I say not unto thee until seven times, but until seventy times seven."

Our way of forgiving the offender is at best a partial way. We forgive, but we do not forget. We plume ourselves on our forbearance, but we meet the one we have forgiven with a cold eye, a silent lip, a perfunctory touch of the hand. It may be that we are proud of the measure of forgiveness we have grudgingly bestowed, but it has in it the pettiness of earth, not the largeness of heaven. God is not pleased. Leave thy gift, oh, unforgiving soul, and go back into self-examination. Look into thine own life. What has not Christ forgiven thee? To him that has loved much because to him much has been forgiven, it is no hard task to be reconciled to a brother or a sister, a son or a daughter, who has in one or another particular given cause for first resentment. The latter may be right, but it must not smoulder. It must burn out with a quick and purifying flame, and after it has done its work, the dove of gentle sorrow, and the song of tender pity, must drive away the very memory of the past.

A Protest Against Desecration

THE revival spirit is evidently making itself felt in England in various ways. A desire is manifested to get right with God, and this is always an accompaniment, as it is an effect of the Spirit's influence. The most recent development is an appeal from a high officer of the King's Household, to the aristocracy of Great Britain, to pay more deference to the Lord's Day. His appeal is supported by the Archbishops and Bishops of the English Church, who have long deplored the secularization of the day. It appears that of late, the custom has grown of paying visits for the "week end" to country houses, and of there spending Sunday in amusements, and, in some cases, in dissipation. It is sought to change all that by a society effort. The reason urged is, that the observance of the Lord's Day is a religious duty, and that even those whose consciences do not acknowledge it, ought to consider how much toil, on the day of rest, their hospitality and their visiting involves to the servants.

It will be interesting to watch the effect of this appeal. Perhaps a fashion will set in that will lead to outward respect for the Lord's Day, but a reform based on fashion cannot be permanent. There needs a deeper motive, otherwise the day will become a burden and a weariness, that will not long be endured. The reform in English society, as in the upper classes in our own country, needs to begin, not with outward observance but with the heart. If the spirit is changed, the Lord's Day will be a day of happiness and spiritual delight. People may be made outwardly decent and respectful by public opinion or by legislation, but no real reform can come in that way. When men seek the Lord with earnest purpose, the day will be all too short to get near to Him. They will not fritter it away in amusements or in regretting that they cannot have them. If the revival work now being carried on in London reaches the upper classes, there will be no need of these appeals, but there will be a spontaneous and hearty observance of the Lord's Day.

LARGEST DIAMOND IN THE WORLD

NEWS comes from Johannesburg, in South Africa, that a diamond has been found in the Premier mines, near Pretoria, that surpasses in size and weight any diamond in existence. measures four-and-a-half by two-and-a-quarter inches, nd weighs 3,032 carats, which a New York expert ys is equivalent to twenty-two ounces. Hitherto the rgest diamond in the world was the Excelsior, which eighs 970 carats, or less than a third the weight of the w discovery. Compared with other famous diamonds s size is gigantic. The Koh-i-noor, which adorns the ritish crown, weighs only 102 carats, and the still more mous Nizam diamond is only 340 carats. Another ptable stone is the Orloff diamond, which is in the ssession of the Emperor of Russia, which originally eighed 779, but was reduced by cutting to 102 carats. was at one time the eye of an Indian idol, and is id to have malign influence on every one who wrongly acquires ownership of it. The value of the w stone is variously estimated at figures from e to four million dollars. The mine in which it was und was not regarded as being of extraordinary value. has been opened about two years, and though many ones have been found there, they have all been of nall size. This discovery will place the Premier mine the front rank. It is not known yet what will be one with the precious stone. There are not many men the world rich enough to give the price the mine wners will set upon it, and probably those who could uy it are men who would not care to have so large sum lie unproductive, as it ust when sunk in a single ewel. It is not like the pre- ious pearl of which our aviour spoke, that symbol- es an eternal possession hich is a source of happiness this life, and infinite joy in he next, to obtain which, a an might rightly count the whole world and all it contains, if he had it, well lost.

The kingdom of heaven is like a merchant seeking goodly pearls: who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had and bought it (Matt. 13 : 45).

A Grand Duke Assassinated

Another startling crime has been committed in Russia. The Grand Duke Sergius, an uncle of the Czar, has been murdered. On February 17, he was driving through the streets of Moscow, of which city he had formerly been Governor, when he was slain by the explosion of a bomb. It was noticed that his carriage was followed by a sleigh in which were two persons. The sleigh shot ahead and then waited for the Grand Duke's carriage to come alongside. As the two vehicles passed, a bomb was flung out of the sleigh and exploded under the Grand Duke's carriage. The effect was terrific. The carriage was blown to atoms, the coachman was instantly killed, and the body of the Grand Duke was dismembered in the most horrible manner. His head was torn off, and his limbs were scattered on both sides. The men who threw the bomb were both injured by the explosion, but one of them said he did not care, he had thoroughly "done his job." The wife of the dead prince, on hearing what had occurred, rushed out bareheaded and without a cloak. The murdered prince was one of the worst of the royal family. He had been removed from office for stealing the funds contributed by loyal Russians for the comfort of the army, and had been suspected of making profit out of the contracts for supplies. It was he who was regarded as responsible for the policy which led to the Japanese war; and it is known that his influence over the Czar had been exerted to prevent concessions to the people. The Grand Duke had so thoroughly incurred the hatred and contempt of the revolutionary party in Russia, that his assassination had been expected. He was aware that his life hung by a thread. But the people are not likely to gain anything by his removal. Such crimes recoil on the perpetrators. The assassination of his father retarded reform in the country for more than a quarter of a century. It is not by crime that a nation comes to its liberties.

We know him that hath said, vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord (Heb. 10: 30).

THE LATE GRAND DUKE SERGIUS

Betrayed by his Thumb

One day last month, the cashier of a bank in New Castle, Pa., received a package by express from Washington, D.C. The letter of advice stated that over five thousand dollars was enclosed, but the cashier found no money in the package. Evidently some thief had abstracted it. The package had been duly sealed, but on examining it, it was found that the seal had been broken, and had been replaced by wax of the same color. The thief, however, had been unable to reproduce the impression of the seal used by the Washington remitter. Instead, he had used his thumb. The impression was clear and distinct. Experts were called in, and they declared that scarcely any two men had the same markings of the skin of the thumb. The employees of the express company who had access to the package were accordingly summoned, and asked to give an impression of their thumbs in wax. They complied, and the impression made by one man corresponded exactly. He was arrested, and confessed his guilt. It seems to be a law of life that the criminal should, in some way, leave a clue to his identity. Now, as in olden time, the means of detection are furnished by the wrongdoer himself:

Thou settest a print on the heels of my feet (Job 13: 27).

Fatal Mental Inertia

At a recent coroner's inquest an eminent medical pathologist gave remarkable evidence. The man whose death the coroner was required to explain had died from softening of the brain. The actual cause of death had been an accident in driving; but the injuries he had received were not of a character to produce death. They had been followed, however, by softening of the brain. The medical expert said that this malady was peculiarly common among agricultural laborers. He said that this class of men did little thinking, and as a result, the brain cells were not nourished, and they gradually refrain from carrying the blood to the brain. The result is paralysis of those parts and the victim goes off in an apoplectic fit or in paresis, while the judge or the clergyman, with far less vigor, goes on living. It is significant that it is not by use, but by disuse that the brain is weakened and destroyed. All God's gifts are intended to be employed, and when they are not employed they are withdrawn.

By much slothfulness the building decayeth and through idleness the house droppeth through (Eccles. 10: 18).

Honest in Death

A peculiar way of paying a debt was adopted by a man who committed suicide in Brooklyn a few days ago. He was entitled by the Union to which he belonged to a sum that would pay the cost of a funeral. But he had been drinking heavily for some days, and he owed the saloon for the cost of his drinks. He had become discouraged and, affected probably by the life of dissipation he had been leading, he determined to commit suicide. In a hotel in which he had taken a room, he connected a rubber tube with the gas jet and put the other end in his mouth. When he was found, he was quite dead. A letter lay on the table addressed to the man from whom he had procured the drinks which he was unable to pay for. It directed him to collect the burial right from his Union, and to send his body to a medical college for dissection, thus saving the cost of a funeral. The man deserved a better end. Few men dying a drunkard's death would have been so honest as to dispense with a funeral in order that a creditor might be paid. But it was a sad alternative of having to give his body to pay for the liquor that had brought him to such destitution. Unhappily, too, the evil did not end there. As he gave his body to pay for the drink that had ruined him, there is reason to fear that he gave his soul to the being who had destroyed it.

He that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death (Prov. 8: 36).

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, of Hackensack, N. J., has accepted a call to the North Baptist Church, of New York City. He will begin his duty in his new pastorate on May 1.

The births in France last year were 25,000 less [illegible] when they were 12,000 fewer than in the previous year. While the population in France is steadily declining, that in Germany is increasing at normal rates.

In Bombay is a Blind Christian Endeavor Society which has a banner with the motto "They shall see He [illegible]." Many of the members, beautiful singers, and every Sunday some of them visit the hospital where patients, nurses and residents [illegible] with delight to their sweet voices and accept the flowers they distribute.

WASH-DAY IN JAMAICA

"OBI WORSHIP" IN JAMAICA

A Correspondent Visits the Maroons, and Tells of Strange, Heathenish Custom

JAMAICA, most healthful of the West India Islands, five days from New York and ten days from London, a colony where there is only one white person to every hundred blacks, is governed by England and supported by the United States. The banana, the orange or the pineapple that you ate for breakfast, probably came from this West India Island, of which you hear little. Thence, also, came possibly your morning coffee and the sugar with which you sweetened it. For these are the island's chief products; and of these products the United States is the biggest, steadiest buyer. "Were it not for you Americans," said a planter to me, in Kingston, the capital of the little island, "we could not live. We would have to abandon our plantations and close our mills. Even our hotels would be obliged to discontinue business, if American tourists should stop coming here."

There is one great industry of Jamaica which, it is a pleasure to report, is not supported by Americans, but by the British. This is the least worthy of the island's industries, the manufacture of Jamaica rum. "There is more drunkenness in the city of London alone, as the result of drinking Jamaica rum," said a rum manufacturer, "than in the whole of the United States."

Jamaica is about as big as Long Island, N. Y., and its population numbers about 800,000. It is distinctly a "Black Colony," as black as any British possession on the coast of Africa, whence came the forefathers of the present inhabitants. The total number of whites on the island is less than 11,000. When we speak of a Jamaican, therefore, we seldom mean a white person, but a black or a "colored" person, the latter being the child of a white and a black parent.

Not so many years ago, this island, in the heart of the Caribbean Sea, was thought to be doomed as a British Colony. Its industries were decayed, and its people densely ignorant. But the State, Christian workers and enterprising business men, stepped in and rescued the country. Now, when the lay world speaks of Jamaica as saved, it means saved in a commerc sense, saved temporally and physically. The Christi world, on the other hand, is aware that in a moral a spiritual sense, the island is still unsaved. Infidelit immorality and heathenish superstitions exist, and barbarous rites a practiced to a greater extent in Jamaica than in any other island of t West Indies. Obiism, or the wo ship of Obi, is secretly the religi and the curse of a great number the blacks. It is not difficult to unde stand, therefore, why I say that, i the moral and spiritual sense, Jamaic is yet to be saved.

SUNDAY SERVICE ON A BANANA PLANTATION

The ship that brought me to th land, where winter days may b spent under summer skies—this pe rennially green garden spot, this lan of golden fruit—arrived at Kingsto on a Sunday morning. Kingston it self is the largest city on the island having a population about equal t that of Lincoln, Neb. The doc was crowded with black people, i their Sunday clothes—black coat and immaculate white trousers. A fellow-passenger who had lived many years in Kingston said, indicating the crowd:

"There you behold the chief citizens of Kingston. Those black people are nearly all shopkeepers and merchants. Even our little Chamber of Commerce is mostly made up of black men. In Kingston there are more white people than in any other town in the island; yet, in our population of 40,000, I do not think we can muster more than 500 white people, exclusive of the military and government employees, who are here temporarily from England. The negroes of Kingston are typical of the educated masses of the island. They can nearly all read and write. But once you leave Kingston and get out into the country, you will rarely find a man who can write a letter or read a newspaper. As a matter of fact, only one person in four in Jamaica, can read and write; and yet we have a great number of educational institutions."

The principal streets, as we drove through on the way to the hotel, were thronged with black humanity going to church. I was told that there were fifty churches and missions in Kingston, and more than a thousand churches and missions throughout the island. "Many of these negroes," said my informant, "are on their way to service in the Episcopal, Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian or Congregational churches. We also have Moravians, Jews and Catholics. There are a number of churches here, conducted and supported entirely by blacks, and yet, in many instances, the negroes attend the churches conducted by whites. In all the Sunday Schools, too, the children of black or colored people predominate. All this church-going, mark you, applies only to the towns and only to the educated blacks. Thousands and thousands of blacks have never been inside a church."

That I was in a country where the Lord's Day was strictly observed, so far as British religious influence can effect such observance, was obvious. I carried a letter of introduction to a gentleman of high standing in Kingston. "I'd like to take you for a ride in my automobile," he said, "but one of the tires needs pumping, and I would not think of asking my man to do that work on the Sabbath."

Nearly all the shops were closed, and some one told me that the man who opened his place of business on Sunday was liable to a heavy fine. Surely enough, on Monday morning when I opened my newspaper, the Daily Gleaner, I found that no less than six shopkeepers, all negroes, had been fined for violating the Sunday law. One was fined $10 for selling ice-cream; another $15 for selling a pair of shoes; a third, $10 for selling American soda water, and an extra $10 for refusing to close his store after having been warned by the police.

The inconsistent phase of the Sunday laws in Jamaica, as in London, is that all the saloons or "public houses" are permitted to open after church hours. "How is it," I asked, "that you fine one man $20 for selling soda water, while the man who sells rum goes free?" The only answer was something about British laws moving in "mysterious ways their wonders to perform."

A great sight on Sunday afternoon in Kingston, was that of thousands of negro children in the streets and outlying roads, all on their way to Sunday School. "This is the work of our various Sunday School societies," said my friend. "Each denomination has such a society, and each fulfils a useful purpose in encouraging and stimulating churches in their Sunday School efforts. The Sunday School Society of the Baptist Church alone, has nearly 2,000 teachers, and over 30,000 scholars."

SUNDAY MORNING SCENE IN KINGSTON

A certain proportion of the blacks has been greatly improved by education, and by military and constabulary control, and, most of all, by Christian influence. But there remain a vast majority without education, who live, in a certain sense, a half-civilized life. Women are wives in name only and polygamy is widely practiced. There is even a certain sect or tribe of negroes, who will not so much as listen to missionaries or to teachers of the Gospel; this tribe being composed of the only actually unconquered people on the island. These are the Maroons. When the Spaniards first came to Jamaica, some four hundred years ago, the island was inhabited by a peaceful tribe of Indians, who possessed a certain culture and civilization of their own. These Indians, the Spaniards proceeded to erase from the face of the earth, killing them at sight, without any attempt to bring them under subjection. Some succeeded in escaping and fled to the interior of the island.

The Spaniards needed laborers to develop the plantations; and began the importation of slaves from Africa. Things had got to going smoothly when the English came and wrested the island from the Spaniards. That was two hundred years ago, and Jamaica has remained a British colony ever since. With the coming of the British, however, the importation of slaves proceeded on a larger scale, some 600,000 having been brought into the island within eighty years. In time the slaves revolted, as the result of inhuman treatment; many escaped to the hills, and there intermarried with the Indians of the interior. The descendants of the runaway slaves and the Indians are the unconquered people who are known to-day as the Maroons.

With a stroke of the pen, the British Government, in 1834, freed all the slaves in Jamaica. But the Maroons remained obdurate. They made war on the whites; and so long did the reign of terror last, that finally the English granted to them a reservation, on which they were to live in peace in perpetuity. That reservation is known as the Cockpit Country, and to that country I paid a visit in company with an English doctor named Darling.

After a short journey by rail, and about two hours' ride on donkeys, we came to the famous Maroon settlement, in the heart of the Cockpit Country. The blacks at first stared at us sullenly; but when the doctor told them in their own patois, that we had come on a friendly visit, and that we craved their hospitality over night, they became wonderfully polite and showed every indication of being pleased that the white men had thus honored them—the "real owners of the island," according to their way of thinking—with their presence. The president or chief of the tribe, invited us to make his house our home as long as we chose. He was a half-educated man, as black as ebony, but possessed great dignity. His house was a little larger than the others in the settlement, and consisted of rudely constructed walls of wood with thatched roof. As we entered the house, four women came out. They were his wives.

Dr. Darling held a long conversation with the chief, and then repeated to me the substance of the information thus gained. "The chief tells me," he said, "that there are about 3,000 black men, women and children in the settlement. This is the chief settlement of the reservation, though the Cockpit Country itself covers a strip twenty miles long by ten miles wide. He says that the white planters offer every inducement to his people to come down into the valleys and work, but that his people now, as ever, absolutely refuse to work for the white man, preferring to remain their own masters. In times past, when the blacks of the island have made war on the whites, the Maroons have fought for the white man. The Maroons despise the blacks who work for the whites."

"But why do the Maroons so persistently refuse to attend Christian worship?" I asked, remembering what church workers had told me in Kingston.

"Well," replied Dr. Darling, "the chief here says that once his people attend the white man's church, they will be drawn to the valleys as the white man's slaves, and that thus the reservation will in time be lost to them. They have a secret religion of their own—probably the worship of Obi."

Next day we started for another Maroon settlement called Nannytown, named in honor of the wife of one of

AT WORK IN THE SUGAR-CANE

PERSONAL LIBERTY

QUARTERLY TEMPERANCE LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE courts of the Temple are thronged with people this last day of the Feast of Tabernacles. Jesus is in the court of the women, as that is the general meeting place, not for women only. This court is also the treasury. It is flooded with light from the massive brass candelabra, seventy-five feet high, each bearing four lamps. Jesus is faced by a company of carping Pharisees. They try to entangle him with judicial questions. He is more than a master of the occasion, and he must needs declare himself. Pointing to the light of the candelabra, he exclaims: "I am the light of the world, they that follow me shall not dwell in darkness, but shall have the light of life."

The Pharisees gainsay this: "Thou bearest record of thyself, thy record is not true." And Jesus declares to them his divine origin; that he is the Son of God, sent by his Father to speak to a sinful world. Some Jews standing by believe on him. They are staggered, however, when Jesus says that hitherto they have been slaves, but henceforth shall be freemen. Their pride is touched, and all alike take position on their Abrahamic pedestal, by declaring that they are Abraham's children, and never were slaves to any man. It suits them to blot out the memory of the time when their fathers were slaves in Egypt, and were delivered because they cried unto the Lord, and also the many times recorded in the books of Judges and Kings, when their sins brought them under foreign despots.

But Jesus sweeps them off their pedestal by saying: "Ye are of your father, the devil. Ye do the deeds of your father. If ye were Abraham's children you would do the works of Abraham. Every one that committeth sin, is the bond servant of sin." They struggle to maintain their pedigree, but do it blindly. They charge Christ with being a Samaritan, the worst thrust a Jew could give. And they also charge that he is in the power of a demon. Jesus seeing in their hearts the desire to kill him, tells them that their father Abraham had no thoughts of murder; but that their father the devil was a murderer from the beginning. Again Jesus tells them that through him they may be free, even from death. They scoff at the idea, and Jesus replies that Abraham believed and was glad. "Abraham lived seventeen hundred years ago, and you have not lived fifty years," they reply. "Before Abraham was, I am," declared Jesus. At this their fury was let loose, and they picked up stones to stone him to death, but he vanished out of their sight.

ILLUSTRATION AND APPLICATION

To teach the children in the home, the Sabbath School and the public school the true relation of love, and law, and life, and liberty, is the most effective way to right the discordant social relations of men, especially those that appear in Sabbath breaking, gambling, impurity, and intemperance, all of which evils attack society under the false banner of "personal liberty," as Cambyses conquered Egypt, when it was the foremost nation of the world, both in arms and letters, by taking advantage of their worship of sacred cats; his troopers being armed each with a crate of cats, that were thrown as hand grenades at the defenders of Egypt, who would not kill a cat to save a life or a wife, and so surrendered their country without a blow. "Personal liberty" is our sacred cat. When Dr. Francis E. Clark was in India, condemning idolatry, one of the natives who had received an American dollar, asked: "What is this image on the coin?" "That is the Goddess of Liberty." "Oh, I thought you did not worship goddesses in America." Dr. Clark tried to convince him that we did not make a Diana of this "silver image," but did not succeed; and, in fact, it is largely because "the almighty dollar" is worshiped, and because "liberty" is a superstition, that such a curse as the drink habit is allowed in our country. No man would make a business of dispensing such a curse to his neighbors if there were not "big money" in it, to be obtained with little effort.

We shall be emancipated from this popular slavery to a false "liberty" when one generation of children has been thoroughly taught not only what alcohol really is but also what "liberty" really is. Not the right of every man to do as he pleases, regardless of whether he so pleases or harms his neighbors; not liberty to do wrong, but only liberty to choose among the various ways of doing right; "liberty under law."

I. False Liberty Exposed. A helpful illustration by which to show the fallacy of the "personal liberty" cry of prodigals and their politicians, is the story of Jacob's and Esau's reconciliation (Gen. 33). Jacob having fled to Haran from the wrath of Esau, whom he had deprived of his birthright through his appetite, and having developed a large family and great wealth in flocks and herds, was commanded by God to go back to the Land of Promise. Fearing the wrath of Esau, now the chief of four hundred warriors, he hesitated, forgetting, as many of us have done, that "all God's biddings are enablings." Like many of us, again he was helped out of his doubts and cowardice by a good wife, who said, "Whatsoever God hath said unto thee, do." But when in his journey he knew he was likely to encounter Esau on the morrow, he was filled with fears, but that same night at the brook Jabbok he was filled with God, who also wrestled with Esau and turned his hate to love, and when they met it was with the kiss of reconciliation.

KING ALCOHOL'S SLAVE-GANG

Let the bread of affliction be given me to eat. Let the cold hut of poverty be my dwelling-place, and the wasting hand of disease inflict its painful torments. Let me sow in the whirlwind and reap in the storm. When I anticipate good, let evil annoy me. When I look for light, let darkness come upon me. Do all this but save me, O merciful God, from the slavery of drink—from the fate of a drunkard!—Talmage.

Then it was arranged they should march back to the homeland together. Esau desired to give Jacob's caravan the post of honor at the front, while he would march in the rear, but Jacob replied in substance: "Your caravan is made up of full-grown men, and so you go ahead, and I will lead on gently according to the pace of the children." If our cities were inhabited only by those who are really full grown in mind as well as body there might be some sense in the cry of "personal liberty," but in the government of our cities and towns, in the arrangements of our streets, in the display of pictures on billboards and in windows, in the discussion of gambling slot-machines and saloons and Sunday sports, we must never forget that there are children in our company, and the fathers are bound to see to it that not only in the home but in the Mayor's office the motto shall be, "I will lead on gently according to the pace of the children." We do not leave poisons and razors about in our nurseries. It would be less foolish and wicked since these only kill the body, than to allow foul pictures and corrupt shows and enslaving saloons on our streets, within reach of our boys and girls in their critical years of adolescence, when life is made or marred, to the blessing or bane not alone of the child but of society, which must pay the penalty if he or she goes wrong.

A citizen of an Ohio city demands $10,000 for a dog's bite. His six-year-old son was bitten by the animal and the child's face was seriously mutilated. Would that there might be equal damages for the poisoned bite of every saloon serpent. The sting of that adder mutilates heart and soul as well as face.

On the coast of Florida there are many rookeries where thousands of sea-birds build their nests and rear their young. Haunting the rookeries of these birds is a large blue crab. He makes a hole in the ground, usually under a log, and, when he hears a noise, elevates his head and protrudes his eyes with startling effect. He is able to take care of himself, for his pincers are powerful and his shell is hard. He is often as large as a big saucer. There is a perpetual war between him and the birds. He wanders among the nests at night, and appropriates the bits of fish left by the nestlings, and the young themselves, if he can find a mother off her guard. But he has to be sly, or he is killed by the stroke of a bayonet bill, and eaten in his turn. When the plume hunters have driven off or destroyed the parents of a rookery, these crabs swarm out and devour the neglected young birds in short order. Such an enemy of our children is the liquor traffic, with his blood-shot eyes and bloody hands. He not only steals away the children's food by enslaving the father, but often destroys the children themselves by the blows of drunken parents, or by inducing them to drink. Strange that fathers, for the sake of political or commercial plums, or mothers, for social plums, will allow their children to be captured by the drink monster.

"When I was a little boy," remarked an old gentleman, "somebody gave me a cucumber in a bottle. The neck of the bottle was small, and the cucumber so large that it wasn't possible for it to pass through, and I wondered how it got there. But out in the garden one day, I came upon a bottle slipped over a little green fellow that was still on the vines, and then I understood. The cucumber had grown in the bottle I often see men with habits that I wonder any strong, sensible man could form, and then I think that likely they grew into them when they were young, and cannot slip out of them now—they are like the cucumber. Look out for such bottles, boys."

Are you willing to obey the law of total abstinence which God writes in natural law, when you can discover it? Perhaps an incident will help the senior scholars to find it. A relative of mine, who was boarding in a hotel, found himself helped to sleep one night by a nine-o'clock glass of brandy. He repeated the sleeping draught at that hour for a few weeks, until one evening he discovered that he was longing for nine o'clock. He heeded the danger signal, and put on the brakes of total abstinence at once.

2. True Liberty Explained. In this eighth chapter of John, and in Romans seventh and eighth chapters, we have the profoundest explanations of true liberty ever written. Negatively Jesus shows that a noble heredity will not save men from slavery. The Jews thought that Abrahamic blood would bring all good in both worlds. They resented the idea that any descendant of Abraham had, or could be in bondage to any man. In fact, their history was full of illustrations that not only to individuals but to the nation sin brings slavery.

And at the very hour when they asserted to Christ their freedom they were enslaved to the Romans; in all this blindness to their enslavement strikingly illustrating the usual blindness of the slaves of sin who never shout "liberty" so much as when they are in abject slavery to drink or some like demon. So in Romans, chapter seven, Paul shows that conscience alone cannot deliver from the slavery of sin, but can only see it and cry, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me?" To which cry of the soul Christ comes in reinforcement, and thus reinforced the spirit is emancipated and the despotic flesh is put into proper subjection. Then on the triumphal arch of "the blessed eighth," it is written, "The law of the spirit of life hath made me free." Of the divine tree of life, love is the root, and law the trunk, and life the sap, and liberty the fruit. Love for God and man grows into law as its strong expression, for all true law in home and street is but the friendly guideboard that shows us the safe road and keeps us out of the marshes of sorrow. And when law enters into our very life because of love for God and man, we prefer to do the things we are required to do and so do them freely, then our life is crowned with the ripe fruit of true liberty.

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Bachelor's Excuse

N a touching letter, addressed to the editor of this department, a bachelor explains why he has remained single. He gives several minor reasons, ch as absorption in business, timidity in approaching e fair sex, fear of incompatibility, and the like, but ms up the whole in the sentence, "Most young women the period are so hopelessly extravagant, that a prudent man dare not marry for fear of being swamped." The bogy of woman's extravagance has been held fore hesitating swains ever since I can remember. In me cases, I am of the opinion that men are really armed by it, but in a majority, I am convinced that e excuse is not sincere. The fact is, that a man who es not marry early becomes settled in bachelor habits, st as a woman becomes settled in spinster habits, and es not, if he is moderately comfortable, care to be sturbed. The stalking-horse of woman's extravagance arches in front of his mind, and serves him as a guard hide his natural selfishness.

Suppose we look at things as they are. What does man know about the cost of a oman's dress, for example? ery little, indeed. A girl with od taste and clever fingers, n dress herself on very little oney. She needs much less an a man imagines to make e pretty gowns and suits in hich she looks enchanting. len have a vague idea that me goods are cheap and some stly. They talk of the simlicity of the girl who dresses in uslin frocks. But these may st a great deal more in the nd than silk or cloth, because ey must be constantly laun'ered.

A young lady came into my en the other day, very beautiully dressed in a shirt waist of teel-colored taffeta and a serge kirt. "It looks rather expenive," she remarked, "to wear silk waist in the schoolroom she was a teacher), but it is eyond my means to wear coton waists, for the washing and roning costs so much."

Girls living at home, either arning their own money, or reeiving an allowance from parents, usually keep well within heir means. The daughters of railway magnate have a quarterly allowance paid them, not excessive, but sufficient for a modest wardrobe, and they would be mortified beyond measure if they ever ran into debt. A young girl who earns a small salary often clothes herself well, pays her running expenses, and either assists her family, or has something in the savings bank, from her good management of the little she has. Women are disposed to be frugal; when they are the reverse it is the fault of their up-bringing, and given a profound motive, such as true love, they often completely change, and develop thrift and economy.

Men waste more than they fancy on their small, personal indulgences. Smoking gets away with a good deal of hard cash in the course of a year. Unless a bachelor is sure that he has no hole in his own pocket, he should not hastily accuse a girl of extravagance.

Alas, dear bachelors, I am afraid you are not at all romantic! I am afraid you have not mastered the alphabet of love. When you do, we will hear of fewer apologies for your single blessedness.

The House or the Children?

Mrs. A. and Mrs. B. are cousins. Mrs. A. has six children. Mrs. B. has seven. One sometimes finds the whole thirteen assembled at play or work in Mrs. A.'s cheerful home, while Mrs. B. does not allow her boys and girls to have company.

Her position is that her carpets, rugs, and furniture will wear out quite soon enough under the feet and hands of her own brood, who are taught to be very subdued and careful in their behavior indoors. Her cousin declares that the house exists for the children; that she does not worry herself over shabby furniture, and that she is much the happier woman when her children have good times at home under her eye, than when they are away. Is Mrs. A. or Mrs. B. the more sensible matron?

My Lady's Dressing-Table

My lady's dressing-table may be furnished with silver-backed brushes and silver-handled implements, or at still greater expense may be fitted out with carved ivory of great value. Celluloid is cheaper than either silver or ivory, and answers every purpose, and unless my lady's purse is deep, she may well be satisfied with this, as it is clean, light, and durable. In the appointments of a refined woman, the utmost delicacy and daintiness are to be sought. Let the ruffled swiss coverings, white over pale pink, or blue silk or silesia, be immaculate and crisply laundered. Brushes should be frequently washed in ammonia and water; combs cleansed and toilet articles polished. If perfumes are used, they should not be too lasting. Refined people do not use heavy and clinging essences, which advertise themselves hours later in a stale odor of musk or other extract. The faintest suggestion is all that can be tolerated in toilet perfumes, but among them there is room for choice, and a lady may have her own taste gratified in rose or violet or heliotrope.

The furniture of my lady's dressing-table belongs to herself, not to others, not even to her husband and her daughters. Each member of a family should have individual toilet appliances, and this rule is rigid about such matters as soap and towels. No one should wipe face or hands on a towel used by any one else. If there are six children, my lady should provide six towels in a row if need be; and never permit one to trespass on the rights of another, in this particular. Nor should she lend her manicure set, her comb, her hair-brush, to anybody in the household. Her dressing-table is her own. Personal privileges and rights in the home should never be infringed or conceded unnecessarily.

THE GIPSY WEDDING

A strange, mysterious people, the gipsies hark back to some very remote past; living among others, but never losing their own distinctive traits and characteristics. Nomadic and peculiar, they live apart, yet family ties are strong among them; and when they love and marry they are apt to be steadfast and loyal.

Little Things

ON little things a great deal of home comfort depends. For instance, paterfamilias enjoys the first reading of the newspaper in the morning. His time for reading it is rather brief, and he leaves it at home for his wife to glance at later in the day when she has leisure. To be obliged, day after day, to ask Harriet, or Carrie, or Theodore, to give him the paper, is a fretting thing, though it is a trifling thing.
